The President's Budget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN H. RAY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 19, 1959

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, the Eisenhower budget is a remarkable achievement.

First. We have a balanced budget, with outgo matched to income. That makes sense to everybody.

Second. No important Government activities—particularly national defense—have been cut back below current levels.

Third. The present income tax rates will bring in the revenues we need, without increasing the rates.

Fourth. We can go ahead with the buildup of defense, space exploration, and general welfare programs.

And fifth, we can hold off inflation.

When you realize that the Government is in the hole this year by about $13 billion, you begin to see what a terrific job President Eisenhower and the Budget Bureau have done on the new budget.

I will be frank in saying that I did not think it could be done. As a Member of Congress, I see the terrific pressures for higher spending from all quarters. Defense costs have been going higher, and in a number of nondefense areas, such as farm price supports, the story is the same. But the President got his Cabinet officers together and told them they must hold expenses down and postpone everything that was not absolutely essential to the country right now.

So the President has given the Congress a budget that can be balanced.

If the Congress goes along with him, the budget will stay in balance, without increasing taxes and without hurting necessary public services.

Speaking for myself, I am going to give the President all the help I can on his budget. It is a good business for all of us, and it will hasten the day when a prosperous economy will produce the income to finance the Government and to make possible a reduction in tax rates.

We owe the President a standing vote of confidence and thanks.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. DENT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 19, 1959

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe the following remarks are important at this time:

There have been some questions put to me lately that are hard to answer. Mainly they deal with the question of foreign and mutual aid, reciprocal trades, automation, and unemployment.

Of course, the question of personal, corporate, and business taxes is inseparable from these questions since it is the money that comes in from taxes that makes the wheels go around, in any of our governmental activities.

I visited a local bank lately and the president asked me a question that many of you would probably ask if I had the opportunity to talk to you.

He wanted to know why a local manufacturer was planning a trip to Europe to set up a production facility to produce the goods now produced here at home. He would be able to ship said goods into the United States cheaper and, with the operations of our income tax schedule, he would make more money with less headaches than he could by keeping his factory operating here.

A side line of his conversation was very interesting. This manufacturer said he could also travel to Europe at will and charge it off his income tax because he would be presumably visiting his business operation.

One wonders how far we can carry this kind of operation. How long can we go on taxing our local industries and people to subsidize foreign production and competition.

All of us want to help our neighbors raise their standard of living, but do we raise their standards by financing their productive facilities if the goods produced are sold here instead of over there where the people need it?

We do not need glassware, rubber goods, steel products, clothing, and other consumer goods; they need these things.

We can make all the typewriters, hi-fi's, televisions, refrigerators, cars, glassware, dishes, and so forth, that we need.

However, we cannot undersell them in our markets because our producers have to pay taxes to put them in business.

If nothing else, the import duty ought to take into consideration the taxes assessed against our own products, and give protection against subsidized goods coming into our country.

The argument that our wages are too high does not hold water. Our factories could produce goods for our consumption at a competitive level if we were to eliminate the many hidden taxes, and open, those that are assessable against our consumer goods.

It is reasonable to assume that if the Government gives incentive to foreign competition that our own people will believe it to be proper and patriotic to buy foreign made goods in preference to our own productions.

In the old days most of the imports, competing in the bulk consumer goods markets were inferior to our own. That day has passed. With the advent of automation, any unskilled person can soon learn the duties of mechanized production and with labor and taxes at a minimum, the competition is out and the products are equal or better in quality.

I recently purchased a set of heavy, well patterned, stainless steel tableware consisting of five pieces—two forks, one knife, and two spoons for 69 cents at a chain food store.

Just for comparison, I put it alongside an American made set of the same pieces. The imports were heavier, better polished and finished, and cost less than half as much.

This may be good, but I cannot see it. The American producer paid higher wages, including hospitalization, vacations, social security, pension funds, paid holidays, time and a half for overtime, full lunch periods, break periods, clean restrooms, supervised first aid, donations to local and national charity and worthy causes, Government records, real estate, State, and local taxes.

He was supervised, checked on, and kept books for Government deductions made voluminous reports, and a hundred and one other disturbing, costly items that make up numerous production costs today.

We have these provisions, safeguards, and regulations because we believe them to be necessary for both the economic and the employee welfare of our country.

How much did the Japanese manufacturer have to add on his selling price for these or any other Government mandated expense?

One fears the criticism of the welldoers and therefore one does not talk about these things, but if someone does not soon start paying attention to this situation we will surely be without prosperity and more serious—without allies.

Basically, most of our allies and friends are becoming kept relatives. Kept relatives are not usually your best friends.

One incident I cannot forget is the refusal of Saudi Arabia to allow us to use our own airport and the Israeli ban on flying over Israel with supplies for our Lebanese occupation and our British allies in Jordan.

Kept relations are not always your best friends is again proven by the furor in Cuba and the anti-American sentiments being formed by the rebellious winners. The three main income sources of Cuba are sugar, tobacco, and American tourists. American taxpayers are the mainstay, financially, of Cuba's economic credit.

Out of 89 nations in the world, we have been and are still giving money out of our so-called mutual aid to 72 nations.

Any nation that depends upon mercenary troops for its security will find itself as useless as a ship in drydock; it looks good, but it is not going anyplace.

Our aid to other countries should come out of surplus, not out of deficiency financing.

How long can we keep up going into deficit financing for foreign spending?

I found in Europe and the Caribbean that we are respected about as much as a sheepherder at a western rodeo.

The only reason he was tolerated was because he had the price of admission.

Not all we are doing or have done is wrong, but certainly a closer look at our program is overdue.

We started out in 1948 with the clear-cut assumption that $15 billion would do the complete job on mutual aid. We are spending $89 billion and powerful voices are demanding more.

We have heard a great deal about the European free market area and agreement, and yet a close study of the proposal shows that not one competitive article can be imported into any country without a compensating tariff to protect local productive costs.

It seems to me that if a government puts extra costs by way of regulations, supervisions, or taxation upon the costs of any article the least it can do is to see to it that the same extras are put on competitive goods.

No sane person wants to close our borders; yet no sane person can expect to finance his competition and stay in business.

It is still a competitive world; and, if we want to help others have a better way of life, let's do it without jeopardizing our own standards.

If we have war with Russia, we must win; and, if we then build Russia and its satellites up to the economic well-being we have established for Japan and West Germany, the question might come up as to whether we can afford the victory.

Victory today means rehabilitation, not reparations.

It is a good Christian doctrine and would be excellent if we were all Christians and lived up to the credo of the Prince of Peace.

Time may prove our system and program to be right; however, I am reminded of the story my father told of the man with the mule.

He figured if he cut down on the mule's fodder he could have more profit from the mule's work.

He was down to three straws a day, but the inconsiderate mule died.

Let us hope we can be around when we have built up the whole world and our shelves have nothing to sell but foreign subsidized goods.

In a community such as mine, the pressures are getting worse and if it were not for the props built into our economy by unemployment compensation, social security, pension plans, United Funds et cetera, there would be less light on Main Street and more personal misery per square foot than at any time in our recent history.

Recently, I read of a hardware manufacturer who shut his plant in this country, opened up in Italy and is shipping his ware into the United States and selling through his old channels at a greater profit.

Under our new formula he is a very patriotic man.

One of my old friends from days in the labor movement, now associated with a rubber company, called and told me of the serious threat of foreign-made goods to their particular field.

One of their good customers who has started producing raincoats in Japan has canceled a sustaining order for 1½ million yards of rubber fabric and is now cutting the throat of his American competitors who have not moved to Japan yet.

A few years ago it was clothespins and toys, now it is getting into the heavy consumer goods field.

The time has come for a select committee to look into the apparently chronic unemployment.

I shall introduce such a resolution if a committee now in existence cannot take this matter under consideration.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, God, who art light and love, and who alone can transfigure the dark mystery of our mortality into meaning and mercy, give us to see that the answers for which we gropingly seek in the darkness of our own devices are hidden in Thy heart. In a day when all we value most so often seems to be at the mercy of all we value least, and the prey of base things we despise, so direct these servants of the Republic that the best of which their dedicated faculties are capable may be brought to bear without fear or favor upon the confused issues of this critical hour, as they fulfill to the utmost the great expectations which sent them here.

May the malignant evils which blight the good earth not devastate our inner lives, subduing us to their false standards, luring us to self-deceit by their subtle sophistries. Help us this and every day to live more nearly as we pray. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the President's budget message was read in the House of Representatives yesterday, and was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for yesterday, which is available to us this morning. The message contains 22 pages. I ask that the message be referred without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to comment briefly on the message to which I have just referred, namely, the President's budget message.

This is not a balanced budget. It is a propaganda budget.

The people were led to believe that the budget would be balanced out of current income. That is not done. The people were led to believe that the budget would open the way to tax cuts. That is not true.

This budget would spend substantially more than current income.

This budget would also increase taxes. There is not a ghost of a promise of a tax cut anywhere within this 4-pound budget. I think those who have been talking so loosely about tax cuts owe the people both an explanation and an apology, Mr. President.

What we have here is a budget which resorts to selective sales taxes to produce its press-release balance. It does not resort to any selective reductions. The people should know this. I am confident they will know this before the year is over and before the Congress adjourns.

Far from opening the way to tax cuts, this budget proposal would open the way to imposition of more and more sales taxes—sales taxes, first, on gasoline; sales taxes, then, on other essentials; and finally, I believe, sales taxes would come on everything. I, for one, am unwilling to travel this road.

This administration has demanded that local governments pay more of local costs. Now it proposes to enter a footrace with the States and the cities, to see who can preempt the gasoline tax first as a source of revenue.

We can maintain our integrity without sacrificing candor.

This Congress will be prudent; it will also be candid.

Both prudence and candor require that this budget be given a most searching study by the Congress, and each committee in it—and, I might say, comma by comma, and line by line—to determine if the needs of the people are served by it or whether it serves only the campaign needs of partisan interests.

It is clear to me that this budget was not prepared to meet the needs of the people, but was prepared to create a political issue for 1960.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of today, entitled "A Precarious Balance," an editorial from the Wall Street Journal of today entitled "The Wages of Irresolution," a table from the Washington Star of January 9, 1959, and an editorial from the Washington Post and Times Herald of today entitled "The President Pulls the Plug."

There being no objection, the editorials and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 20, 1959]

A PRECARIOUS BALANCE

The budget submitted to Congress yesterday by the President shows that the administration foresees for the next fiscal year, which begins July 1, 1959, and ends June 30, 1960, expenditures of $77 billion and receipts of $77.1 billion, leaving a surplus (at least on paper) of $100 million.

The latest estimate of expenditures and receipts for the current fiscal year, as contained in the new budget, places them at $68 billion and $80.9 billion, respectively, with a resultant deficit of $12.9 billion. In its plan to eliminate this record peacetime deficit and replace it with a surplus of $100 million—an overall difference of $13 billion—the administration is counting, therefore, upon a reduction of $3.9 billion in expenditures and an increase of $9.1 billion in receipts.

The increase in estimated receipts from the 1959 level of $68 billion to $77.1 billion is based, in the main, on the continued expansion of the economy that has been in progress since last April and the resultant increase in the productivity of the present tax rate structure. However, the figure is also contingent upon certain supporting legislation by Congress in the field of revenue. One of these is legislation extending the present tax rates on corporate profits and certain excise taxes for another year; the second calls for certain tax adjustments, aimed at putting the Federal highway program on a pay-as-you-go basis; the closing of certain tax loopholes and revising postal rates upward by $350 million. All told, the revisions would add about $600 million in revenue.

As has now been the case for several years the bulk of the budget expenditures is devoted to the cost of previous wars and preparations for possible future war. Thus if we add the costs of (1) major national security (59 percent) and (2) Veterans' Administration (7 percent) and (3) interest on the public debt (10 percent) we have accounted for all but 24 percent of the $77 billion total. Perhaps the most striking point in the entire picture is that of the remainder of 24 percent one-third will go for agriculture.

The reduction in expenditures of $3.9 billion from the 1959 level is, unfortunately, somewhat less impressive than it sounds. It does not represent any drastic slashes in spending, but rather the incidence of certain important developments on the spending side of the ledger. Thus what would appear to be a bold reduction of $775 million in the farm price-support program (now grown completely out of hand) reflects the termination of the acreage retirement sector of the Soil Bank plan; the ending of the emergency has permitted a drop in the estimated need for support of the Government guaranteed mortgage market by $2,564 million; and the narrow surplus could be turned into a deficit, under the official budgetary estimates, should Congress fail to act on the increase of $1,375 million in the International Monetary Fund until the fiscal year 1960.

THE WAGES OF IRRESOLUTION

It is time, painful as the task always is, to look at some hard figures.

In fiscal 1953, the year in which President Eisenhower took office, the Federal Government spent $74.3 billion and ran a deficit of $9.4 billion. There followed an effort to get control of the Government's spending, and in two of the later years there were even budget surpluses.

But after 1955 there came a succession of steadily rising budgets. In 1955 spending was $64.6 billion. In 1956, $66.5 billion. In 1957, $69.4 billion. In 1958, $71.9 billion. And in the current fiscal year, $80.9 billion.

So for the entire period of the Eisenhower administration the Government has spent almost $30 billion more than it received in revenue. This staggering sum of money would be burden enough for the Nation if it could have been borrowed from the public. Since little of it could be, the greater part of it has had to be created—in effect, printed—by the central banking system.

Now President Eisenhower, in real and justified concern, has tried once more to come to grips with this problem which is matched in importance to the Nation only by that of military survival. The budget he proposed yesterday is balanced—that is, if all goes precisely according to hopes, then the Government will end the year with a tiny surplus left after its spending.

This budget, it seems to us, is a valiant effort at cutting the costs of what the Government does. The President plans to reduce 1960 spending by nearly $4 billion from this year's level. Most of this reduction comes from the natural elimination of last year's emergency antirecession measures, but the effort to cut costs shows up in tighter budgeting for many different departments.

Yet for all of that, spending will still be $77 billion. This would be $12.4 billion more than the administration spending a bare 5 years ago.

And the promised balance turns on a fulcrum of hope. Income tax revenues will have to increase $8.3 billion from the same rates. Congress will have to approve higher excise taxes on gasoline and raise postal rates again. Nature will have to hold down the cost of farm price supports by granting less bountiful yields. Everyone, the President and the Congress, must succeed in resisting the inevitable temptations to spend a little more here, a little more there.

It is this that most strains hope. For even in this budget it is plain that Mr. Eisenhower himself was not always firm against the enormous pressures for enlarging the Federal Government. It is true that he has succumbed to no new programs. Yet some of the old ones seem unconscionably, and inexplicably, enlarged.

A pointed illustration is the spending for Federal aid to local communities in solving local problems. The new budget includes $2.1 billion in such aid under 14 different programs. This is almost double the amount spent for the same purposes 3 years ago. By the close of fiscal 1960, the commitments for future expenditures on these same programs will be more than $6 billion. And these billions do not even include local aid in the general appropriations for such things as rivers and harbors, intercity highways and the spending under health and welfare.

"These totals," as Mr. Eisenhower ruefully remarked, "show how rapidly direct Federal aid to communities is growing." How rapidly, one might add, all spending programs grow, once begun, unless there is determination not only to economize in the doing but to challenge the scope of what is done.

If this new budget does not bring full results to match the intent, it lies in this. Exactly a year ago the President was proposing a 1959 budget of $74 billion. This is the figure now grown to more than $80 billion. It swelled by $6 billion not because the administration grew less efficient but because it wavered under the pressures to do more. It is not an experience to strengthen hope that the 1960 figure of $77 billion will not in turn have swelled come another January.

Still, the budegt record from 1953 to 1959 is proof in its middle years of what can be done with the right kind of determination. Mr. Eisenhower in 3 years' time cut $10 billion from the annual spending without sacrifice in any essential Government service. Again in this 1960 budget he shows how much can be cut away between even one year and the next, once resolved to do so.

But the record since 1953 also proves what happens the moment determination yields to irresolution. And it will take a lot of resolution to make this 1960 budget mark a real reversal rather than a passing interruption in the long, upward spiral of more spending, more taxes, and more inflation.

THE PRESIDENT PULLS THE PLUG

The big question that Congress and the country will want to ask about President Eisenhower's 1960 budget—a tortured balancing of economic, social, and military risks—is whether it threatens to increase all our hazards without overcoming any of them. While he forecasts revenues on the basis of a rapid recovery which production figures indicate is by no means assured, Mr. Eisenhower offers as his contribution to growth the prospect of a $6.7 billion cutback in the Government's new orders for goods and services starting July 1. Similar retrenchment in the fall of 1957 contributed materially to the 1958 slump.

Against this general backdrop, the President proposes in particular to end special Federal unemployment benefits, even though the acknowledged first purpose of this program is to help needy individuals and there are now more than 4 million people out of work with the number growing. He would also cut off Federal support of the general home mortgage market through the Federal National Mortgage Association in the face of an increasingly tight market in homebuilding funds. He delivers a general jolt to the construction industry in the news that new water resource, health, hospital, and general office building projects are to be wholly forbidden or greatly curtailed. And he would taper off urban renewal and airport assistance programs.

While he promises a strengthened defense, the President asks less new money for missile procurement and at the same time proposes to buy fewer military aircraft, to drop three Air Force wings, to reduce military air transport squadrons, and to trim military base construction. And all of this would come on top of extensive cutbacks in manpower, ships, and weapons ordered in the current fiscal year. The President remains inflexible on an accelerated Polaris submarine program, rebuffing Congress by asking no important new funds for this promising deterrent weapon.

In place of the long-sought, much studied plan to help underdeveloped nations achieve a real breakthrough in economic growth, the President asks a scant $700 million, 1-year appropriation for the starved Development Loan Fund. This capitalization would be about one-seventh of what Mr. Eisenhower's own advisers believe is necessary, a $5 billion, 5-year program.

The budget is a real blow to hopes for a revitalization of scientific research, both pure and applied. The slight increase in defense research will perhaps cover rising costs. The National Science Foundation was denied funds in areas of notable weakness in United States science. The increases provided for space exploration are gratifying, but overall, this emphasis bespeaks more concern with propaganda requirements (which are real enough) than with support of a broadly adequate scientific effort.

Some features of the budget upon which its much touted balance in part depends need questioning on technical (as well as political) grounds. Is it wise to tamper with the normal operations of the Export-Import Bank and the FNMA by selling off their portfolios of investments to achieve a temporary income gain? Are the greatly curtailed estimates for agricultural price supports grounded on much more than prayers for bad weather? The resort to such devices to construct a facade of fiscal soundness is a dubious contribution to political responsibility in public finance.

We do not pretend to know the exact dollar measure of the deficiencies in the Eisenhower budget. A rough measure may be suggested by the report that departmental requests to the Budget Bureau, from which most of the chaff is generally already eliminated, totaled some $8 billion more than Mr. Eisenhower allowed. An $85-billion budget in a $500-billion economy would not be a marked departure from the proportional allotment of national output in recent years, and a gross national product of this size would be a realistic expectation for fiscal 1960 if the Government acted vigorously to sustain and encourage growth rather than subtract from it. Within such a program, a clear duty of leadership would be a call for any tax increase necessary to produce a balanced budget coincident with the approach to full employment.

Many of the revenue and legislative proposals in the budget message are not new. We have often endorsed a number of them, such as elimination of the postal deficit, bond financing for TVA, the item veto, greater use of user charges, a self-supporting highway program, statehood for Hawaii, and home rule for Washington. These hardly compensate, however, for the basic lack of vision in the budget itself.

What the administration fails to recognize is that the greater demand and therefore the greater potential for national growth at this juncture is in fields like housing, education, research, defense, public works of all kinds, and other enterprise in which Government must play a key role. The President in effect is saying to his countrymen, "Go buy a new TV or a new car or a new hula-hoop whether you neeed it or not. To give you confidence, I'll see that your money isn't wasted on things you want more but can't buy for yourself." This is a prescription for private bloat, public stagnation, and general peril, and we hope the country will not be made to swallow it.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, as the session opened today, just a minute or so after 12 o'clock the distinguished majority leader launched into a diatribe against the Eisenhower administration and the budget which the President has sent to the Congress. A Republican conference was being held at that time, Mr. President, and I, as acting minority leader, on behalf of my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], was the only Republican Senator present on the floor at that moment. I say that because the Senator from Illinois and many other of my seniors could far better answer the inelegant prose of the majority leader than can I.

Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader suggests conciliation in the field of civil rights. So do I. But I likewise suggest to him that he might practice a little conciliation with respect to the budget of the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. Not now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let the RECORD show that the Senator refuses to yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator suggests that the President of the United States apologize to the American people. I suggest that the majority leader apologize to the President and to the American people. He suggests that prudence and candor——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator misquotes me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator refuses to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator misquotes me. I should like for the RECORD to show that the Senator refuses to yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I have 3 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may have an additional 5 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I want to make one thing perfectly clear——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield?

Mr. KUCHEL. No; not yet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator misquotes me.

Mr. KUCHEL. I refuse to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator refuses to yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. If I have misquoted the able majority leader, Mr. President, I am sure the RECORD will be corrected.

Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader has suggested that we have a proposed budget which is resorting to or proposes increased use of the sales tax—a Federal sales tax—in order to bring it into balance. That is not so.

I was a Member of the Senate at the time when the Senate of the United States adopted legislation increasing the highway users tax. That was not in accordance with the recommendations of the Eisenhower administration. President Eisenhower recommended to the Congress that it approve the principles embodied in the so-called Clay Commission recommendations, under which a separate governmental corporation would have been established and there would not have been any increases in the Federal highway users tax. Nevertheless, the majority in the Senate refused to go along with the Clay Commission's recommendations. The rest of us, on this side, then agreed to the second alternative of a so-called pay-as-you-go basis, under which the $33 billion Interstate Highway System would then commence construction. For the able majority leader now to suggest that it is this administration that recommends sales taxes in order to balance the budget, I think, comes with just a little bit of poor grace.

So far as I am concerned, I do not know whether we on the Republican side of the aisle will agree, line by line and comma by comma, with the recommendations of this administration in the field of spending. Some of us will agree in some instances, and some of us will disagree in others. But I do suggest that, so far as the President of the United States is concerned, in good faith he has given to the Congress, a coequal branch of the Government, as my former colleague, former Senator Knowland, used to describe it with accuracy, his recommended budget. When it comes to the Congress, the Congress is expected to try to do a job for the people of the United States.

I now yield to my able colleague the senior Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, first the Senator says that I talk of conciliation, but offer none of it. I will allow my record to speak for itself.

I concluded my statement by saying that we would take the President's budget, examine it word for word, comma for comma, and line for line. I do not know how I could be more conciliatory or considerate than that.

I do not know what the Senator means by "inelegant prose." I am not very familiar with elegance, anyway. And I care not what the Senator thinks about my poor grace. I should like to have him explain to the American people, however, whether this proposal involves a sales tax or not. I regard it as a sales tax, and the Senator has not changed my view on that question.

I stated that the President's budget was an attempt, in a foot race, so to speak, to take revenue from the States and the cities, and an attempt to preempt the gasoline tax fund. I think that is true.

I stated that I believed the budget anticipated revenue which was not available, and I supported that statement with the conclusions of some of the leading newspapers of the country.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly. I always yield to my colleagues.

Mr. KUCHEL. Is it not true that if we do not adopt the recommendations of this administration and increase the highway user's tax, we shall be borrowing more money from the general fund in order to complete the $33 billion Interstate System?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that is true; and I believe that if we do not make some reductions in some of the proposals the President makes, we shall have a substantial deficit. I think the President expects us to have a substantial deficit. I think the administration expects us to have a deficit.

I believe the President has made certain recommendations which the Congress will cut. I believe he has made certain recommendations which the Congress will increase.

I hope the time has not come when a Senator cannot rise and express his opinion on the President's budget without being accused of operating inelegantly and with poor grace, and without conciliation. I hope the time will come when better and stronger arguments can be made for the President's budget than those adjectives.

Mr. KUCHEL. What was the language the Senator used about the administration making an apology?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I did not say anything about the administration making an apology. I read an account of a meeting which was held the other day, at which some top spokesmen of the Republican Party offered hope for tax cuts when they left the White House. I am not speaking of the distinguished minority leader. I do not care to get into personalities, because that would be poor grace.

I said, with regard to that bait, that propaganda, and that political statement, that I thought those who had been talking so loosely about tax cuts owed the people an explanation and an apology.

I made no reference to the President. The President never said anything to me about tax cuts. The President talked to me about reducing spending.

I read on the front pages of the newspapers statements by certain leaders who said that if we could take this proposal in its entirety, just as it is written, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t"; if, in effect, we would say, "Me too"; and if everything came out just as it was estimated—and I do not believe anyone thinks it would come out that way—we might have $100 million extra. Then, somewhere, somehow, someday, down the road somewhere, we might have a tax cut.

I say that those who make statements like that ought to explain them to the American people. Every time a Senator expresses his views, he does not necessarily attack the President of the United States. I think it is a very poor defense for a Senator to try to wrap the flag of the President around his shoulders and say, "He is untouchable; his budget cannot be discussed. No Senator may express his opinion about it. He cannot even suggest that it be carefully considered by various committees without having his remarks branded as a 'diatribe.' "

I suggest that the Senator from California, in his elegant California manner, choose his words better.

Mr. KUCHEL. As I take my seat, let me say that I shall try to do so in the future. But I still suggest to my able friend from Texas that to my mind prudence and candor are as desirable in the legislative branch as they are in the executive.

Mr. BUSH, Mr. MORSE, Mr. DOUGLAS, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Am I correct in recalling that the Senator from Texas referred to the President's budget as a propaganda budget?

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is my opinion.

Mr. BUSH. I resent that type of description of the budget. I happen to know a little about the way the budget was presented. I happen to know that the President has never felt so deeply about any issue during all the time he has been President of the United States as he feels about the fiscal affairs of this country as they exist today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. I do not have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] has the floor.

Mr. BUSH. I think that was a most regrettable statement for the distinguished majority leader to make. It is completely unfair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator refers to me, and I think he should be willing to yield.

Mr. BUSH. I shall be glad to yield if I may have the permission of the Senator from California to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Connecticut may have the right to yield to me for an observation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUSH. I shall be glad to yield if that is agreeable to the Senator from California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield for that purpose?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I observe that I have not questioned the depth of the President's feeling or the depth of his understanding, or the depth of his knowledge.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator is questioning——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let me complete my statement.

I did not go into any of those questions. I have been talking with those who, for several days, have been going over the budget as it was presented to them in an effort to determine exactly what it provides, what it means, and what it will do.

Also, I have been reading statements in the newspapers about the forlorn hope that we are to have a tax cut down the road somewhere. I have not said a thing about the President. I have said that in my opinion the administration budget is a propaganda budget; and I believe time will establish that contention.

Mr. BUSH. That is the statement to which I object very strongly. I think it is designed to give the American people a lack of confidence in the President and in the budget. I think it most unfortunate that the majority leader finds it necessary to make such a statement on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I thank my able friend from Connecticut for his observations.

I yield the floor.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am delighted to hear this semantic discussion. I intend to make a ripsnorting, tooting budget speech, but I do not intend to make it today.

First, I wish to get back on the track, and place our committee assignments before the Senate.

Mr. President, by direction of the minority steering committee, I submit an order designating assignments to committees from the minority. I ask that the assignments be read for the information of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that the order be entered.

Committee on Rules and Administration: Messrs. Curtis, Javits, Morton.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have no objection to the order. I believe it is very important to have it considered by the Senate, and I am glad that it has been presented to us. It is very important that the Senate act on it as early as possible, so that the committees may be organized, because there are several measures which need immediate attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the order was entered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 1

"Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to take such remedial action as deemed necessary to preclude the closing of low-power booster stations necessary for television reception in certain areas of the State of Colorado

"Whereas there are many communities and farm areas within the State of Colorado whose people depend upon low-power booster stations as their only means of receiving television programs; and

"Whereas the rugged terrain of the Rocky Mountain region makes the use of ultra-high-frequency translator stations impractical, if indeed not impossible, according to the opinions expressed by competent and qualified broadcast engineers, as well as by certain members of the Federal Communications Commission; and

"Whereas it is economically impossible for these communities and farm areas to support, construct, or operate any other form of duly authorized television service; and

"Whereas there is ample proof that low-power booster stations can be regulated so as to preclude interference with licensed television services or other services; and

"Whereas, the Federal Communications Commission did summarily dismiss, without formal hearing, its own rulemaking proceedings relating to 'repeater' or 'booster' stations operating in the VHF television band of frequency assignments; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did on December 31, 1958, make formal announcement of its dismissal of petitions for reconsideration, including those filed by Gov. Stephen L. R. McNichols, of Colorado; the Honorable Edwin C. Johnson, former Governor and U.S. Senator from Colorado; and the Honorable Gordon Allott, U.S. Senator from Colorado—all of whom sought to procure reasonable rules which would permit the continued operation of said booster stations under the regulatory power of the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did also announce on December 31, 1958, that all booster stations would be given a period of 90 days in which to apply for conversion to ultra-high-frequency translators or some other authorized television operation, and upon failure to do so would be ordered to cease operation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 42d General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the Senate concurring herein), That this general assembly hereby memorializes the Congress of the United States for such remedial action within such 90-day period as the Congress deems fit through the exercise of its authority over the Federal Communications Commission to insure the continued operation of low-power booster stations, to the end that the people in the nonmetropolitan areas of the State of Colorado shall not be denied their basic right to equality of access to the informational, educational, inspirational, cultural, and entertainment service of the American system of free television broadcasting; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Colorado in the Congress of the United States.

"CHARLES R. CONKLIN,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.
"ROBERT S. EBERHARDT,
"Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.
"ROBERT L. KNOUS,
"President of the Senate.
"LUCILE L. SHUSTER,
"Secretary of the Senate."

Resolutions adopted by the Western Governors Conference at Honolulu, T.H., and the 14th Biennial General Assembly of the States at Chicago, Ill., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide statehood for Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

A resolution adopted by the Minneapolis Lodge, 102, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Minneapolis, Minn., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide statehood for Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

A resolution adopted by the Republican Party of the County of Hawaii, T.H., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide statehood for Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

A resolution adopted by the Lafourche Parish School Board, of Thibodaux, La., favoring the enactment of legislation to curb the powers of the U.S. Supreme Court, and so forth; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION, RELATING TO TEACHERS' SALARIES—RESOLUTION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the Parent-Teacher Association Marie Curie, Junior High School 158, of Queens, Bayside, N.Y., favoring the enactment of legislation to grant Federal aid to education as it relates to teachers' salaries. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there is still a serious shortage of classrooms and of teachers requiring emergency action on the part of the Federal Government; and

Whereas limited financial resources available to many communities are not adequate to support construction programs of sufficient size to eliminate their classroom shortages and not sufficient to provide proper compensation to their teachers; and

Whereas the national interest requires that the Federal Government assist State and local governments in solving these pressing problems: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Government provide Federal financial assistance on a grant basis to help meet the problems of inadequate facilities and inadequate teachers' salaries by enacting such Federal aid to education legislation in 1959.

These resolutions have been adopted by the executive board of the P.T.A. of Junior High School 158, Queens, January 14, 1959.

MARY GROSSMAN,
President.

RESOLUTIONS, PETITION, AND RADIO ROUNDUP OF ORGANIZATIONS OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota

[Mr. LANGER], I present for appropriate reference a series of resolutions, a petition, and a "GTA Daily Radio Roundup." I ask unanimous consent that these matters be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions, petition, and roundup were received, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"RESOLUTIONS, NRECA REGION VI, ANNUAL MEETING, BISMARCK, N. DAK., OCTOBER 27–28, 1958

"MARKETING OF POWER

"Whereas the preference rights of Rural Electric Cooperatives and municipal utilities must be protected to assure public benefits from Federal multipurpose resource development projects; and

"Whereas any contract having to do with either the purchase, marketing or exchange of power by the Bureau of Reclamation is a public matter and a matter that directly or indirectly involves the rights and interests of the preference customers; and

"Whereas the principle that important public contracts must be reviewed by the Congress has been established by the Appropriations Committees with respect to generation and transmission loans made by the Rural Electrification Administration and with respect to the Atomic Energy Commission by the Atomic Energy Joint Committee of the U.S. Congress: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we request the Interior Committees of the U.S. Congress to hold for review for a period of 45 days all contracts or agreements proposed between the Bureau of Reclamation and/or the U.S. Corps of Army Engineers and any commercial or nonprofit electric utility for the purchase, sale or exchange of electric energy.

"INTERINDUSTRY COUNCIL

"Whereas we were told when we were invited to join the Interindustry Farm Electric Utilization Council that its purpose was to promote a joint effort in expanding power use; and

"Whereas we of the rural electric cooperatives have respected this agreement to be noncommercial and nonpolitical at these meetings; and

"Whereas at the October 7 meeting of the council at Buffalo, N.Y., Secretary Benson's Director of Agriculture Credit Service, Mr. Kenneth L. Scott, flagrantly violated this gentlemen's agreement by using the meeting as a self-service forum to promote the Benson anti-REA proposals; and

"Whereas the character of the meeting was such as to deny the rural electric representatives any opportunity whatsoever to present their own case in the light of Mr. Scott's uncalled for remarks; and

"Whereas the rural electric co-ops' representatives by being present were helplessly made use of in lending prestige to Mr. Scott's remarks; and

"Whereas the meeting provided Mr. Scott with a ready-made platform for reaching power company representatives who had long been promoting these very same ideas; and

"Whereas this performance is no isolated incident in the rapidly developing master plan to eleminate the REA program: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we condemn Secretary Benson and his assistant, Mr. Scott, for their ill-famed campaign to pressure the rural electric cooperatives with the Benson proposals and particularly in using the interindustry council meeting for such propaganda activities.

"COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S RULING

"Whereas a ruling by the Comptroller General of the United States on a loan made by REA to the Central Iowa Power Cooperative of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to service Greene County Rural Electric Cooperative of Jefferson, Iowa, imperils the entire lending program of REA; and

"Whereas, by this ruling the Comptroller General has usurped and attempted to nullify the declared will and intent of Congress; and

"Whereas the Comptroller General has reaffirmed this ruling; and

"Whereas this ruling is a complete misinterpretation of the REA Act and gives the power companies what they could not get from the Congress and the courts: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we approve and commend the counsel for the Iowa Cooperative, William Wisdom, and L. F. Wilcox; the special counsel of NRECA, Wise and Potamkin; the Secretary of Agriculture and the Assistant General Counsel of the Department of Agriculture, E. F. Mynatt, for their fine briefs pointing out the defects of this ruling; and be it further

"Resolved, That the cooperatives respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to investigate this ruling and its background.

"REA LOAN SOURCE

"Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture last February sent to the Congress a proposed bill which provided that the cooperatives secure their financing in Wall Street—for which no legislator would act as sponsor; and

"Whereas such bill would double or triple interest rates to the rural electric systems; and

"Whereas such bill would virtually kill the generating and transmission program and bankrupt many distribution cooperatives; and

"Whereas the Congress has always evidenced its wholehearted support of the REA program by consistently providing sufficient loan funds: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to oppose any and all proposals which would send the rural electric systems into the private money market for their financing, and we urge Congress to continue its fine support of the rural electric program which means so much to the people of rural America and to the country as a whole.

"INTEREST RATES

"Whereas a number of bills and proposals were presented to the 85th Congress to increase REA interest rates; and

"Whereas the Congress, by enacting the Pace Act in 1944, and fixing the interest rate of 2 percent, therein made a covenant with the rural electric cooperatives to proceed with area coverage at reasonable retail rates; and

"Whereas both REA Administrator David Hamil and Director of Agriculture Credit Services Kenneth Scott testified before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Government Operations this year that increased rates would have a detrimental effect on telephone loans and electric loans to systems in sparsely settled areas; and

"Whereas we believe the continuance of the 2 percent interest rate is necessary to enable the rural electric systems to complete the task of providing full, efficient, and reasonably priced electric service on an area coverage basis: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge the Congress to vigorously oppose any change or proposed change in the law, the effects of which would increase REA interest rates.

"REA REORGANIZATION

"Whereas the original Rural Electrification Act of 1936 provided for strictly nonpartisan administration of REA and provided for the appointment of an Administrator by the President, with confirmation by the Senate for a 10-year term to insure nonpartisan, nonpolitical administration; and

"Whereas Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra Taft Benson, pledged himself to a congressional committee to make no changes in REA without first consulting the proper congressional committees and other interested groups; and

"Whereas in June 1957, the Secretary did reorganize REA by requiring that all loans of $500,000 or more, and that all loans of whatever amount, to new borrowers, be reviewed by the Secretary's Office; and

"Whereas Secretary Benson has supported a bill in Congress which would drastically increase interest rates and drive electric and telephone cooperatives to Wall Street for their financing: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we are vigorously opposed to any reorganization of REA; and be it further

"Resolved, That as soon as the new Congress convenes in 1959 a bill identical or similar to the Humphrey-Price bill of 1953, which would restore to the REA Administrator all of the functions and authority vested in him by the original act of 1936, be introduced and passed.

"REA PROGRAM

"Whereas the rural electric cooperatives undertook the electrification of rural areas including the byways and back roads on an area coverage basis upon the congressional assurance that adequate loan funds would be available at 2 percent interest under the Pace Act of 1944; and

"Whereas the REA Administrator, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Comptroller General, President Eisenhower, and others are advocating changes in the Rural Electrification Act which would increase the interest rate and send us to the money market for at least part of our funds; and

"Whereas such changes would make it impossible to serve the remaining unserved rural people and would curtail the expansion of service to our present consumers: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we protest the actions of the REA Administrator, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Comptroller General, and the President of the United States in using the power and prestige of their offices to pressure the rural electric systems into agreeing to or advocating changes that would be detrimental to the program.

"SELLOUT PROTECTION

"Whereas forces opposing the rural electrification program are moving in on cooperatives in various parts of the country, e.g., the New Jersey and Arizona cases, for the expressed purpose of buying them out; and

"Whereas it is evident that the power companies instituting sellouts are being directed by executives hired and maintained by their holding companies; and

"Whereas electric consumers in and outside the program will pay more for electricity if these sellouts become more widespread: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That in keeping with the keynote set by our general manager, Clyde T. Ellis, we launch a counteroffensive; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge REA to provide more aggressive assistance to cooperatives needing its help to continue their existence—such as was the case of cooperatives in New Jersey and Arizona; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge our State legislatures to provide us with the machinery to function as public agencies or utility districts where such a step is necessary to preserve consumer ownership; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to make all large transmission lines common carriers as a means of helping to advance the objectives of abundant, low-cost power to consumers; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to protect rural electrics and all electric consumers by abolishing the electric holding companies; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to investigate and expose the apparent master plan to cripple and destroy the rural electrification programs; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to thoroughly investigate the sellout cases that have now occurred in order that the Rural Electrification Act may be strengthened as a means of protecting the interests of consumers and all Americans who are concerned about the contributions rural electrics are making.

"YELLOWTAIL DAM

"Whereas the Yellowtail project in Montana was authorized by the 85th Congress during its 1958 session; and

"Whereas power is urgently needed from this development: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Congress be urged to appropriate necessary funds to expeditiously construct this project as rapidly as possible.

"RELATING TO FEDERAL TRANSMISSION LINE IN IOWA

"Whereas approximately 250,000 rural people receiving electrical energy from Iowa rural electric cooperatives, and approximately 60,000 residents of Iowa cities and towns receiving electrical energy from municipally-owned electric systems, are served by systems located in whole or in part within the Iowa marketing area of the Bureau of Reclamation; and

"Whereas only a small percentage of these more than 300,000 people are now receiving the benefits of low-cost Federal power; and

"Whereas a majority of the rural electric cooperatives and municipal electric systems in this area are facing critical power-supply problems; and

"Whereas the great majority of these systems, all preference customers, who are not now receiving Federal power, are burdened with exceedingly high costs in producing electrical energy and are adjoined by systems with lower power costs; and

"Whereas many miles of federally owned transmission line are in existence in other States in the upper Missouri River Basin with practically none in existence in Iowa; and

"Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation marketed more power in 1957 to a nonpreference customer from the Hinton, Iowa substation at a dump rate of 2.93 mills than was sold by the Bureau to the rural electric cooperatives at a firm rate of 5.01 mills; and

"Whereas the reason that low-cost Federal power has not been available to all of the approximately 300,000 preference users in the Iowa marketing area of the Bureau of Reclamation has been the absence of transmission lines over which the Bureau could make delivery of such power: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that region VI, in annual meeting assembled, urge the Congress of the United States to appropriate the necessary funds for the Bureau of Reclamation to construct an adequate transmission line from its Hinton, Iowa substation eastward to a point near Storm Lake, Iowa, south to a point near Harlan, Iowa and southeastward to a point near Creston, Iowa, complete with substations to be located at the three aforementioned points; and be it further

"Resolved, That we of region VI make every effort to fully inform the Congressmen, Senators and Governors of the three States comprising this region of the urgency of this matter and solicit their support of the objectives cited in this resolution.

"PREFERENCE CLAUSE

"Whereas water power resources belong to the people of the United States and not to private individuals or corporations; and

"Whereas for more than 50 years the preference clause in Federal power laws, giving preference to nonprofit public and rural electric systems, has been an important influence in insuring the continuation of a healthy competition in the electric industry; and

"Whereas over 400 of the rural electric systems are dependent either directly or indirectly upon Federal power projects for their power supply; and

"Whereas constant attempts are being made to weaken the preference clause by such devices as the Case amendment and the Niagara limitations enacted in the 85th Congress: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to reaffirm its support for the preference rights of nonprofit, consumer-owned electric systems and to oppose any repeal, watering down or evasion of the preference clause; and be it further

"Resolved, That we strongly urge Congress to enact legislation to remove the effects of the Case amendment to the Rivers, Harbors and Flood Control Authorization Act of 1958; and be it further

"Resolved, That the preference concept should be extended to cover transmission of all power.

"G AND T LOANS

"Whereas the demands for increased power supply for the rural electric systems pose a continuing problem for the rural electric systems; and

"Whereas the cost of power to the systems has always been favorably influenced by our right and opportunity to generate and transmit our own power where this would result in lower costs: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we commend the REA Administrator upon his making of the recent Mississippi and Texas G and T loan and we urge him to continue to lend funds for generation and transmission when such loans are feasible; and be it further

"Resolved, That the REA Administrator be urged to finance interconnections where mutually advantageous, but we oppose any return to the policy requiring the partnership arrangement with the private power companies; and be it further

"Resolved, That Congress be urged to continue to provide adequate funds for this purpose.

"ATOMIC ENERGY PROGRAM

"Whereas the rural electric systems have urged that the Congress provide for acceleration of the atomic energy program; and

"Whereas the rural electric systems have also urged that the Congress provide the opportunity for adequate participation by rural electric and other nonprofit electric systems; and

"Whereas the atomic energy program belongs to all of the people and should be protected from monopolistic abuse: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge the 86th Congress to provide an atomic energy power program that will be for the benefit of all of the people and in particular will provide for Federal construction of atomic power generating plants as proposed in the Gore bill of the 85th Congress, with preference in the sale of any power therefrom being accorded to cooperatives, municipalities and other nonprofit, consumer-owned agencies.

"POTOMAC RIVER DEVELOPMENT

"Whereas the Potomac is a national resource which, if developed, could help bring better living and prosperity to the region, our National Capital and the Nation; and

"Whereas comprehensive development of the Potomac River Basin promises a potential of 700,000 kilowatts capacity of low-cost hydroelectric power badly needed by rural electric systems, municipalities, industry, and others: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we support the cooperatives of the area associated with us in the rural electrification program in their fight for comprehensive development of the Potomac.

"NATURAL RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

"Whereas both national and international concerns demand that our country be strong, healthy and growing; and

"Whereas wise and timely development of our natural resources so as to provide the maximum benefits for our people is a fundamental means to foster our country's growth; and

"Whereas the Russians with whom we are competing in a fateful cold war threaten to surpass our hydroelectric generation in two more years under a massive program; and

"Whereas our own Government has cut down funds for natural resource development to the barest minimum; and

"Whereas we all have a vital stake in this contrasting situation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to give prompt and wholehearted support to full-scale water resource development that is in keeping with our country's potential.

"TVA SELF-FINANCING BILL

"Whereas the Tennessee Valley Authority after 25 years of exemplary service to its region and Nation is the sole supplier of power at wholesale to 50 cooperatives whose yardstick resale rates influence power rates throughout the country; and

"Whereas without the prompt construction of additional generating capacity TVA will lack sufficient power to meet the needs of its distributors by 1960, or 1961 at the latest; and

"Whereas in addition to the normal and steadily increasing demand for power in its area TVA also is called upon to deliver vast blocks of power, amounting to over half its production, to national defense installations in which all of us as citizens are interested; and

"Whereas in the past 5 years TVA has received no appropriations for starting additional generating stations, and construction capital from this source is not in sight; and

"Whereas a plan approved by the TVA Board for financing new capacity by revenue bonds to be sold in the open market has been before Congress, and will be renewed before Congress at the opening of the next session; and

"Whereas we believe this plan is the best proposition ever made by a region to the Nation and would in effect wither the widely cultivated claim that TVA power is subsidized: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That, recognizing the supply crisis with which TVA is faced, we urge upon Congress, and upon our several Representatives individually, passage without delay early in the 86th Congress of TVA self-financing legislation on the order of the Kerr bill previously approved by the Senate and of the Davis-Jones bill favorably reported at the past session by the Public Works Committee of the House, the welfare of the 50 cooperatives that distribute TVA power and of the Nation as a whole requiring it.

"THE TRIMBLE BILL

"Whereas the divergent methods of allocating costs to power being applied by the various bureaus and agencies will render the future construction of many multiple purpose projects economically impossible and will affect adversely the orderly development of our national water resources; and

"Whereas the Trimble bill introduced in the 85th Congress set forth an equitable formula by which cost allocations should be determined, and would fix the responsibility for making the determination in the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we urge the introduction and early passage in the 86th Congress of a bill identical or substantially similar to the Trimble bill.

"NATIONAL TAX EQUALITY ASSOCIATION

"Whereas the electric cooperatives object strenuously to the gross misrepresentations and unfair propaganda of the National Tax Equality Association; and

"Whereas the NRECA Board of Directors has recently voted to support the suit of National Milk Producers Federation to recover damages from the NTEA: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we give our wholehearted support of the action of the NRECA Board in this matter; and be it further

"Resolved, That NRECA publicize the names of the contributors to NTEA when the names are available.

"FARM ELECTRIFICATION RESEARCH

"Whereas farm electric mechanization is lagging far behind industrial electrification; contributing to a lower living standard for American agricultural workers; and

"Whereas practical farm electrification equipment is not now available because of a lack of development research; and

"Whereas neither power suppliers nor manufacturers will undertake basic, developmental research because the size of the task is very great in comparison with expected returns, and it appears that farm electric mechanization is primarily a problem of agriculture and not of industry; and

"Whereas information gained through research activities is generally not made available promptly to those people who can benefit from such information: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That REA encourage its field men to obtain data on specific problems in their areas which need research and which might be solved through the use of electricity for the benefit of agriculture; and be it further

"Resolved, That REA review and publicize farm electrification research results to REA borrowers in order that current research information might be put to practical use without delay; and be it further

"Resolved, That ARS be urged to set up its organization so as to encourage greater emphasis on farm electrification research and better coordination of its electric research projects in order to provide one point of contact for research information. And further that ARS be urged to develop means whereby this information can be made readily available to all interested parties.

"RURAL TELEPHONE PROGRAM

"Whereas participation by cooperative organizations in the rural telephone program is at a standstill; and

"Whereas, the loss of this competitive element in the program can only be detrimental to the whole program: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge REA to actively promote the formation and growth of rural telephone cooperatives consistent with both the language and the spirit contained in the Senate Appropriations Committee report recommending appropriations for fiscal 1959; and be it further

"Resolved, That we endorse the National Telephone Cooperative Association and encourage all telephone cooperatives to join this organization for their mutual benefit.

"COOPERATION WITH OTHER GROUPS

"Whereas a study of the record of the 84th Congress shows that 42 percent of the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives from metropolitan areas voted favorably 75 percent or more of the time on matters affecting the rural electric systems; and

"Whereas only 27 percent of the Representatives from rural and small-town districts voted favorably 75 percent of the time on matters vital to the welfare of the rural electric systems: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That NRECA cooperate with, and solicit the cooperation of, other groups friendly to the concept of consumer-owned and operated electric systems for their mutual benefit.

"JOB TRAINING AND SAFETY

"Whereas there is always need to continue and further develop the job training and safety training programs to train rural electrification workers in new techniques and safety practices, and this need is emphasized by the high accident rate thus far experienced during the year 1958; and

"Whereas the job training and safety training instructor staff in many States is not adequate to meet the present need for training; and

"Whereas the continued success of the job training and safety training programs is dependent upon adequate Federal appropriations to the States to stimulate and assist them in conducting the program: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we express to Congress our appreciation for appropriating the full amount for fiscal 1959 as authorized by the George-Barden Act of 1946, and for having authorized appropriations under a title in the National Defense Education Act of 1958 for the area vocational program; and be it further

"Resolved, That we request Congress to appropriate for fiscal 1960 the full amount authorized for vocational education under existing laws; and be it further

"Resolved, That we oppose the repeal of the Smith-Hughes Act of 1917 and George-Barden Act of 1946, because such repeal of these acts would seriously hinder the job-training and safety program and in many cases would probably mean their elimination.

"FAMILY-SIZE FARM

"Whereas the census report shows that the farm population has decreased by 2 million people in a single year; and

"Whereas the cost of equipment to operate a farm has increased to such an extent that it is virtually impossible for the family-size farmer to compete with corporation farming; and

"Whereas the anticipated increase in population points to an overwhelming need for greater food production; and

"Whereas many of our most intelligent, talented, and aggressive leaders of this country, past and present, are men and women born and raised in a rural community; and

"Whereas if we are to encourage the younger generation to remain on the farms, there must be an incentive for them to remain there; and

"Whereas the feasibility of electric loans in this region are based on the density of a farm membership, the decrease in farm members will greatly reduce the security of the administration's loans: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this regional meeting of delegates and members of the NRECA, assembled in Bismarck, N. Dak., request the Congress of the United States to vigorously support and adopt legislation for a new farm program that will emphasize, encourage, and make it possible for the family-size farm to continue to operate feasibly."

[From the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association daily radio roundup]

"ST. PAUL, MINN., November 24, 1958.—Most all of the corn referendum talk so far, in the newspapers and in the big farm magazines, has been about what happens to farmers in 1959. Is plan No. 1 the best deal—or should corn farmers stick with farm laws built up over the past 25 years and vote for plan No. 2?

"So, every farmer who is eligible to vote has a tough decision to make. But he ought to remember that he will be growing corn for a lot of years in the future, not just in 1959; and he's got to make up his own mind about which plan will serve him best in the long run.

"Secretary of Agriculture Benson, speaking for the administration, has been urging a vote for his plan No. 1 and has been using every means short of outright solicitation.

"Of the three big farm organizations, the Farm Bureau alone says Benson is right. Its headquarters tells farmers to vote for all-out production next year, with 65 percent of parity price support in 1959. That's Benson's plan No. 1. But neither the Farm Bureau nor Mr. Benson seems to know how to use up the huge surplus of corn that surely would result from such a production free-for-all. Some see a 4.5 billion bushel crop in 1959 under Benson's plan.

"On the other hand, the National Grange says neither plan is any good and, as a result, the referendum is no measure of farm opinion. Whichever way farmers vote, the Grange says, administration is such that farm income will go down again. And the Farmers Union, too, says both plans are terrible. It's a choice between two evils. Last week, Farmers Union presidents from the Corn Belt States met to discuss the referendum and they carefully weighed the short- and long-range features of both plans. They came to the decision that corn farmers ought to give very careful consideration to plan No. 2.

"In the first place, they said, plan No. 2 would retain price supports based on the parity concept. Also, it would 'repudiate Secretary of Agriculture Benson's policies, just as farmers repudiated them in the November 4 election.' But more important, the farm leaders agreed, was the fact that plan No. 2 'gives farmers a chance to hold on to a semblance of the program, based on parity with production adjustments.' They emphasized that plan No. 2 does not mean that farmers would have to comply with acreage restrictions unless they wanted the higher price support. But if they keep the legal foundation in force they can 'go to the new Congress and ask for an increase in corn-acreage allotments to a fair figure, along with a more nearly decent level of prices next year and in the years after.'

"The Farmers Union State presidents who took part in the corn meeting, and issued the joint statement of policy, were Edwin Christianson, of Minnesota; Ralph Bradley, of Illinois; John Raber, of Indiana; Maurice O'Reilly, of Iowa; K. W. Hones, of Wisconsin; Harold Golseth, of South Dakota; and Elton Berck, of Nebraska.

"And apparently farmers aren't the only ones who are worried about a free-for-all on corn if plan No. 1 is voted in. The Minneapolis Tribune, representing a big-city area, warns in an editorial that 'with all controls off acreage and probably production would rise and the surplus made bigger than ever. And with acreage controls gone the price supports may go next.

"'Corn farmers,' the Tribune suggests, 'should consider such possibilities when casting their corn-referendum votes.'

"That sounds like good advice. But, of course, it is up to each farmer to decide for himself."

WILLISTON, N. DAK., August 11, 1958

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture,
Congress of United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COOLEY: Thanks for sending me the historical review of Government subsidy.

I am like many others, both in North Dakota and other States, worried about what we read in newspapers and magazines about Mr. Benson's orations on farm subsidy because Mr. Benson never mentions any of the other subsidies that are paid to other segments of United States. As I understand it, of all taxes paid to the Federal Government 60 percent is paid by the average taxpayer and only 40 percent paid by corporations, therefore, the average taxpayer pays 60 percent of subsidies for farm program of some $5 billion but for the other about $100 billion and he pays 60 percent on that $100 billion. Compare that with the $5 billion that Benson is talking about.

Now, if Mr. Benson is such a religious and honest man, why doesn't he tell the whole story to the public when he is talking about subsidy?

Also, what bothers us who know, how can Mr. Benson dictate to both Congressmen and Senators who know the facts? It does not seem to matter whether they are Republicans or Democrats. Yes, according to newspapers and magazines, Mr. Benson is also dictating to President Eisenhower. The question in my mind is, who is this fanatic Mr. Benson and what power does he have that he can control most of the Congressmen and Senators who are elected to represent all the people of the United States? What would or could happen if all the people of the United States found out that we have a real dictator in the United States?

Yours very truly,

ALEX LIND.

To the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"Whereas it has come to the attention of the board of directors of the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District that the Department of Interior is considering a proposal to consolidate regional offices VI and VII of the Bureau of Reclamation by transferring the functions of region VI at Billings to the region VII office at Denver; and

"Whereas the forthcoming construction of the Garrison diversion unit in North Dakota to be initiated possibly as early as 1961 will require numerous contacts and a close relationship between the regional and district offices of the Bureau of Reclamation and the regional office and the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District and local irrigation districts in both contractual negotiations and the immense construction program that will be undertaken; and

"Whereas the consolidation of these two offices will seriously impair the efficiency of the Bureau of Reclamation in the development of the Garrison diversion unit as well as to adversely affect the close relationship that exists between the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District and irrigation districts and the region VI office: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Garrison Diversion Conservancy District at meeting duly assembled at Devils Lake, N. Dak., this 23d day of October 1958, urges the Secretary of the Interior to cease consideration of the consolidation of the region VI and region VII offices of the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation until the Garrison diversion unit and other reclamation projects proposed for the Upper Missouri River Basin in the Flood Control Act of 1944 and acts amendatory thereto have been completed; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Reclamation and the members of the congressional delegations from North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana."

ESTABLISHMENT OF AN EFFECTIVE EXPORT PLAN

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, an expanding and healthy export market is vital to the economic well-being of the American cotton farmer. Just as obvious is the fact that the administration of the cotton export program can make or break foreign markets for U.S. cotton. One cannot escape the conclusion that the 1958–59 cotton export program is not being operated in the best interest of U.S. cotton farmers.

So far this season, net sales under the cotton export program total 1,831,457 bales. In addition, some 211,601 bales have been registered under the payment-in-kind phase of this program. So midway through the current season, there is a total of slightly more than 2 million bales scheduled for export by next August 1, the beginning of the 1959–60 season.

During this same period of the 1957–58 season, more than 4.4 million bales had been sold for export. And at the halfway point of the 1956–57 season, 6,230,153 bales had been sold for export. During the 1956–57 season, the United States exported a total of about 7.6 million bales. Last season our exports were about 5.7 million bales. For the current season the Department of Agriculture says, "Exports will do well to reach 4 million bales."

Mr. President, section 203 of the Agricultural Act of 1956 directs the Commodity Credit Corporation to make cotton available at prices not in excess of the level of prices at which cottons of comparable qualities are being offered in substantial quantity by other exporting countries. It further directs the Commodity Credit Corporation to sell such quantities of cotton as will reestablish and maintain the fair historical share of the world market for United States cotton, said volume to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Since the inauguration of the cotton export program under section 203, the Department has consistently increased its minimum export price. Under the direction of section 203, the minimum sales price for M–1" cotton at the end of May 1956 was 25.89 cents per pound. It is currently 28.30 cents per pound.

Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a resolution asking the Secretary of Agriculture to announce an effective cotton export program for the next crop year. It is essential that a more competitive program be formulated, and I hope that this resolution will be adopted at the earliest possible date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 28), submitted by Mr. STENNIS, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Whereas the Congress directed the Secretary of Agriculture in section 203 of the Agricultural Act of 1956 to regain and maintain the export markets for American cotton (of not less than 5 million bales) by making United States cotton available for export at competitive world prices; and

Whereas such program was highly successful during the first 2 years of its operation; and

Whereas exports of United States cotton during the current marketing year are expected to drop sharply, due in part to the higher price at which the Department of Agriculture is offering cotton for export: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate (1) that the Secretary of Agriculture should establish an effective program for the period from August 1, 1959, to July 31, 1960, in accordance with said section 203, under which United States cotton will be priced competitively abroad, so as to encourage the consumption of United States cotton abroad, and (2) that the terms of such program should be announced far enough in advance of August 1, 1959, to enable exporters of American cotton to compete with foreign growth in making sales for delivery during such period.

STUDY OF TRANSPORTATION POLICIES IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and Mr. SMATHERS) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 29), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Whereas a sound national transportation system is essential to the continued economic development and defense of the United States; and

Whereas fair and equitable Federal policies are necessary to assure such a sound national transportation system; and

Whereas hearings held by the Surface Transportation Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have disclosed there is urgent need for a comprehensive study of such transportation policy and related problems by the Congress, to the end that sound policies may be evolved: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to—

1. the need for regulation of transportation under present-day conditions and, if there is need for regulation, the type and character of that regulation;

2. the area of Federal policy dealing with Government assistance provided the various forms of transportation and the desirability of a system of user charges to be assessed against those using such facilities;

3. the subject of the ownership of one form of transportation by another;

4. Federal policy on the subject of consolidations and mergers in the transportation industry;

5. policy considerations for the kind and amount of railroad passenger service necessary to serve the public and provide for the national defense;

6. the problems arising from action by the Interstate Commerce Commission in permitting the charge of more for a short than a long transportation haul over the same line in the same direction; and

7. additional matters of Federal regulation (and exemption therefrom) and Federal promotional policy in regard to the various forms of transportation.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ on a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The Committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $ shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported three original resolutions (S. Res. 30, 31, and 32), which were referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

"(2) The chairman of each committee shall from time to time and at the earliest date practicable, report to the Senate the general nature of inquiries or investigations the committee proposes to undertake, or, in any case in which he deems the national security might be endangered by such report, he shall in writing advise the President of the Senate of that fact.

"(3) The chairman or one of the members of a committee shall when practicable consult with appropriate Federal law-enforcement agencies with respect to any phase of an investigation which may result in evidence exposing the commission of Federal crimes, and the results of such consultation shall be reported to the committee before witnesses are called to testify therein.

"(5) Witnesses, counsel, and other persons present at committee hearings shall maintain proper order and decorum. Counsel shall observe the standards of ethics and deportment generally required of attorneys at law.

"(6) Witnesses at committee hearings shall be required, so far as practicable, to submit written statements of their proposed testimony in advance of the hearing at which they testify.

"(d) Whenever a committee determines that evidence relating to a question under investigation may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate persons called as witnesses therein, the committee shall observe the additional procedures prescribed by this paragraph, so far as may be practicable, to insure fair treatment of such persons:

"(1) Preliminary staff inquiries in such investigation may be directed by the chairman, but no witnesses shall be called to testify until approved by the committee.

"(2) All testimony, whether given under subpena or voluntarily, shall be given under oath.

"(3) Counsel for a witness may be permitted in the discretion of the presiding member at any hearing and as justice may require, to be heard briefly on points of right and procedure, to examine his client briefly for purposes of amplification and clarification, and to address pertinent questions by written interrogatory to other witnesses whose testimony pertains to his client.

"(4) Testimony shall be heard in executive session when necessary to shield a witness or other person about whom he may testify.

"(5) The secrecy of executive sessions and of all matters and material not expressly released by the committee shall be rigorously enforced.

"(6) Witnesses shall be permitted brief explanations of affirmative or negative responses, and may submit concise, pertinent, oral, or written statements relating to their testimony for inclusion in the record at the opening or close of such testimony.

"(7) An accurate verbatim transcript shall be made of all testimony, and no alterations other than to correct clerical errors shall be permitted therein.

"(8) Each witness may obtain transcript copies of his testimony given publicly by paying the cost thereof. Copies of his testimony given in executive session shall be furnished a witness at cost if the testimony has been released or publicly disclosed, or if the chairman of the committee so orders.

"(9) No testimony given in executive session shall be publicly disclosed in part only, except when the committee decides that deletions from the transcript are required by considerations of national security.

"(e) Whenever a committee determines that any testimony, statement, release, or other evidence or utterance relating to a question under investigation tends to defame, degrade, or incriminate persons who are not witnesses, the committee shall observe the additional procedures prescribed by this paragraph, so far as may be practicable and necessary, to insure fair treatment of such persons:

"(1) Persons so exposed to defamation, degradation, or incrimination shall be afforded an opportunity to appear as witnesses, promptly and if possible at the same time such evidence of utterance is given, and under subpena if they so elect. Testimony relating to such adverse evidence or utterance shall be subject to the applicable provisions of paragraph (d) of this subsection. Any such person may, in lieu of appearing as a witness, submit a concise, pertinent sworn statement which shall be incorporated in the record of the hearing at which the adverse evidence or utterance was submitted.

"(f) Vouchers covering investigating expenditures of any committee shall be accompanied by a statement signed by the chairman of such committee that the investigation was duly authorized and conducted under the provisions of this subsection.

"6. In any case in which a controversy arises between committees as to the jurisdiction of any committee of the Senate to make any inquiry or investigation, the question of jurisdiction shall be decided by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, without debate, but such decision shall be subject to an appeal. Such decision finally arrived at, with or without appeal, shall not operate to invalidate proceedings of the committee prior thereto."

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES

Mr. HAYDEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 34), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate, to the Official Reporters of the Senate debates and proceedings, during the period February 1, 1959, to December 31, 1959, so much as may be necessary, not to exceed $20,000, for the employment of additional office personnel.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE—EXTENSION OF COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to address myself briefly on another matter. I desire to introduce a bill for appropriate reference. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed an additional 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, at the opening of this Congress, we engaged in a debate of wide meaning.

The votes which we took were, in a literal sense, addressed to the rules which govern us. But the widespread interest which was aroused did not flow from a passionate absorption by Americans in parliamentary technicalities.

The public concern stemmed from the underlying issues. And of all of these, the most controversial is that of civil rights.

There was only one reason for the heat in the arguments over rule XXII. It is the contention that because of rule XXII the Senate is barred from facing a major issue of our times.

I have personally never agreed with that conclusion or contention. I have always felt that the Senate is capable of facing squarely any issue that is before the American people.

The Senate reflects the temper of the American people. Therefore, it cannot do things that the people do not want done. And sometimes this inability is interpreted by heated partisans as a refusal to face the issues.

There is a basic reason for the Senate's insistence upon having at least a two-thirds vote to shut off debate. It is a device which forces reasonableness even upon a majority.

It is an additional instrument to safeguard what we consider our most cherished concept—government by the consent of the governed.

Majorities—as any man of experience knows—have a tendency to be temporary. Therefore, the Senate has rules which require that the majority take into account the views of the minority if the majority wishes to work its will.

There is no question involved of the right of the majority to govern. We all concede that. The only thing at stake is whether the majority shall have an unrestricted right to govern.

On this issue, I believe the American answer is no. And the Senate has answered that question "No" by unmistakable votes of overwhelming majorities.

I do not intend to spend my time or your time today with lengthy arguments to demonstrate that the two-thirds requirement does not paralyze the Senate. I believe that the necessary demonstration should be one of action.

For many years, I have had the feeling that the inability to secure action on civil rights is due to the fact that the problem is being approached from the wrong direction. It is being pushed in a manner which the American people will not buy.

Far too many of the measures that are proposed are efforts to punish people for the sins of their fathers. There is in many of the proposals an underlying tone almost of blood guilt.

In 1957, in closing the debate on the civil rights bill, I stated that, as far as I was concerned, Texas had been a part of the Union since Appomatox. I would like to expand on that concept a little.

Every State has been a part of the Union since Appomatox, and it is even more important for the victors than for the vanquished to grasp that idea.

It applies directly to civil rights.

The civil rights issue is one which divides our country. We can use it to continue to divide our country. Or we can reason together as prudent men charged with the heavy responsibility of finding a solution.

The American people, I believe, want a solution. There are injustices to be corrected. There are inequities which must be abolished. There are unfairnesses which cannot be tolerated.

But there is one thing which we must keep firmly in our minds. We are dealing with people, people who have long memories and strong feelings.

And there can be no solution except through the people themselves. No Greek god is going to step down from a machine to decree justice, equity, and fairness.

I voted for the civil-rights bill, because I believe that the right to vote is the most important instrument for securing justice. I was convinced that steps were needed to safeguard that right.

There are some allegations that the steps we took were not enough. If so, I am willing to take further steps.

Government is always limited in what it can do to help men and women. But when it guarantees men and women the right to vote, there is plenty they can do to help themselves. If there are loopholes, I believe they should be plugged, and we are told that one of the loopholes is the fact that the Attorney General does not have subpena powers under the voting rights law.

There are other problems upon which we can act. The Nation has been outraged by the bombings that have taken place in the past few months. These bombings are not properly a part of the civil rights problem, because they are the product of diseased minds.

The civil rights problem centers around prejudices that are deeply ingrained in the minds of people who are normal. Nevertheless, the problem is reflected in the activities of those who are unbalanced.

Since even deranged mentalities are capable of interstate conspiracies, Federal action is needed to help the local authorities. I believe that this will be accepted by people all over our country.

But the ultimate objective of our activities must be a positive solution to the civil rights issue. Punitive legislation may satisfy the souls of those who feel outraged. But it aggravates, not heals, the gaping wounds.

We set up the Civil Rights Commission in the 1957 act because we were looking for positive solutions. Unfortunately, that Commission has not had sufficient time to do all of its work. Its life should be extended.

It is about time to find out what would happen if we were to adopt a positive approach to the problem. And I am proposing today a step which is modest, but which presents a new direction.

The civil rights issue is essentially a controversy between people. It bears a strong resemblance to the great management-labor controversies in our land.

Of all the Government agencies, one of the most successful has been the Mediation and Conciliation Service. It has done more to preserve peace and secure justice than almost any other agency of Government.

The concept of conciliation is a simple one, but like many simple ideas it has tremendous power. In any protracted controversy there is the stage of stalemate, a stalemate so bad that people cannot talk to each other. At this point, an outside and objective party arriving on the scene can act as an objective listener with a judicious temperament and get people talking again.

I believe we should borrow from a tested concept. I believe we should draw upon the experience of the past. I believe we should try in a new field something that has worked in an old field.

I am introducing today for appropriate reference, legislation to accomplish four objectives:

First, to establish a Community Relations Service as an independent Federal agency to keep open the channels of communication among our people.

Second, a bill very similar to the concepts advanced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], to make the interstate transportation of explosives for bombing and interstate conspiracies to intimidate people with bombs Federal offenses.

I am sure thorough hearings can improve the language suggested, and I hope we can secure thorough hearings promptly.

Third, a measure to grant the Attorney General subpena powers in voting rights cases—subpena powers that can be enforced if necessary by a three-judge Federal court.

Fourth, a measure to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission to January 31, 1961.

These measures, by and large, are self-explanatory. But I wish to say a few words about the Community Relations Service. I feel that if it is properly established and manned, it could be one of the longest and most far-reaching steps toward an ultimate solution of the civil rights issue that could be taken.

As I understand the concept of civil rights, they cannot undoubtedly be enforced by law. They involve the idea of human acceptance, of human understanding, and of human dignity. The outward manifestations of tolerance can be enforced by guns, clubs, and bayonets. But understanding does not exist until the people themselves will it to exist.

Controversies involving civil rights have reached a point where they can be paralyzing to whole communities. But they are controversies which can be settled if the yawning chasm between people can be bridged.

Usually when the controversy reaches a point where it is paralyzing, an added factor complicates the picture. It is that the leaders on both sides cannot talk to each other.

They have said unforgivable things. Unforgettable insults have been traded. Passions and emotions have been inflamed to a pitch that will not cool down by itself.

But somehow life must go on. People must be fed. The implements of transportation must move. The channels of commerce must flow uninterrupted.

These are compulsions upon both sides to find a just settlement. And a just settlement can be found—if only people will talk to each other.

At this point, a conciliator would be worth his weight in gold. A man who could be trusted and who could come into the community and go back and forth between the leaders could break the log jam in communications.

And the people themselves would settle the controversy. The measure I am introducing would place heavy responsibilities upon the conciliator. He would have to be an imaginative man; an understanding man; a man of absolute integrity.

Such men are difficult to find. But they are not impossible to find. And I think that one of the lessons of American history is that great crises and troublesome times invariably produce a breed of men who measure up to the crises and who can master the times.

I know this concept will not satisfy those who seek to punish. But nevertheless, this is a concept which has proved its effectiveness in the labor field over a long period of time.

The conciliator would perform the most important of all services—keep people in communication with each other. And I have a deep and abiding faith in the ability of people to solve any problem—so long as they are in communication.

We might as well face the fact that the civil rights issue is not going to go away—and it should not go away so long as there are injustices to be corrected in any State in this Union.

We must also face the fact that the issue is not going to be solved by force—because the ultimate goal is human acceptance and that is never secured by force.

If an issue will neither disappear nor yield to force, a third course must be found.

I do not even pretend that the measure I am proposing solves the civil rights issue. But it is a step in the direction which I believe will ultimately solve it. And I hope the bill will be enacted into law.

Even more, I hope it will bring forth other proposals which will help our people to help themselves.

Personally, I am willing to face any issue which comes before the Senate in the regular course. I will neither evade nor avoid any problem.

My record is entirely clear, as is the record of all my colleagues who were here to vote on the 1957 act. We did not need to invoke cloture for every Senator to stand up and be counted.

And we will have to invoke cloture in the future, I hope.

The American people are tired of efforts which seek to "test" something to put the monkey on somebody else's back, to put somebody else on the spot or to "make a record." They are looking for efforts to achieve objectives.

There are no jobs for the jobless to be found in refighting the battles of history. There is no human dignity to be gained by punishing those who may have committed sins in the past. There is no unity and concord in bitter, divisive arguments.

There are forces at work in our country today which will lead us to prosperity, dignity, and unity—if we give them a chance to operate.

Mr. President, I can sympathize with those who feel that everything should be done at once—or nothing. But, even though I can sympathize with them, I cannot agree they are pursuing a course that will bring the best results.

Rome was not built in a day. And compared to the promotion of human understanding, the building of Rome was a minor and relatively simple job.

The important thing is to determine what progress can be made.

The late great President Franklin D. Roosevelt achieved progress during 12 years—in more than three terms; selected overwhelmingly for a fourth term—with nothing but willpower in this field.

President Truman achieved progress during 8 years with nothing but willpower and a desire for legislation.

President Eisenhower in 6 years has received a voting rights bill and a Civil Rights Commission.

Let us see whether we in the Senate cannot take another step, by providing leadership that the American people yearn for.

In this spirit I have introduced my bill today. I hope the bill will be passed, and I hope it will become a long step toward a new and a fresh approach to an extremely vexing and troublesome problem, which in my opinion is holding back the solution of many problems which need to be faced up to and to be solved now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 499) to establish a Community Relations Service to provide conciliation assistance in communities where disagreements or difficulties among citizens are disrupting, or are threatening to disrupt, the peaceful life of the community; to extend the Commission on Civil Rights; to provide further means of securing and protecting the right to vote; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a memorandum relating to conciliation.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

1. In the labor field, conciliation has a history dating back nearly 50 years. It was in 1913 that the act creating the Department of Labor authorized the Secretary "to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes whenever in his judgment the interests of industrial business may require it to be done."

2. In 1947, a Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service was established as an independent agency. The first director of the independent agency was Cyrus S. Chang.

3. It is difficult to give statistical data on the agency simply because it settles so many disputes before the participants get to a strike or a lockout. But there is universal agreement that when administrative conciliators are sent into a "stalemate" situation they can be more effective than any other agency of government in the labor-management field. Their effectiveness flows from the fact that basically people want a stalemate situation solved and the conciliators have more flexibility than anyone else.

4. The degree of confidence in which the agency is held can be determined to some extent by the mere fact that in fiscal 1957, 77,973 cases were referred to it. Many of these cases were not accepted for lack of jurisdiction or were consolidated with others. But the important thing is that so many people wanted the agency brought into their dispute.

5. A typical situation in which the service would be useful in a civil rights case is a bus strike. The whites can force the Negroes to sit in the back of the bus. On the other hand, the Negroes can shut down the buses altogether. This leads to an intolerable situation, and sooner or later the community will want to settle. But they will be incapable of a settlement because the white and Negro leaders have called each other so many harsh names that they cannot talk to each other. If at this point a conciliator arrives on the scene who can go back and forth between the leaders his services would be invaluable.

AMENDMENT OF CODE RELATING TO PROCUREMENT PROCEDURES OF ARMED SERVICES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill entitled "Armed Services Procurement Amendments of 1959."

This bill is a revised version of Senate bill 4294 which I introduced in the 85th Congress on August 14, 1958. See the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 14, pages 17499–17503. Since that date the response and interest which has been expressed in the bill has been most encouraging to me. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a number of articles reflecting the interest in the bill. I ask unanimous consent, too, that the bill which I have just introduced, together with a section-by-section explanation of this bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, I think we are all aware of the importance to our Nation of the procurement activities of the Department of Defense. The quality of performance of these activities has enormous significance for our military defensive strength, for many of our industries, and for our Federal budget. Between $22 billion and $24 billion are expended annually under the authority of the Procurement Act. In all three of these respects the job of military procurement has very substantial implications for our national economy.

Successful performance of the task of military procurement depends on many factors. The amount of money appropriated by the Congress and the fiscal management applied to its expenditure by the executive branch loom as very large factors. Not less considerable in its significance is the quality of the operational management of procurement both within the military departments and in industry. It is with this management problem that the bill I am introducing attempts to deal.

It is a truism among Members of Congress that we cannot legislate good management. However, it is no less true that we can legislate in such a way as to make good management difficult even with good managers. In many respects I believe that the last statement can be said to apply to the laws which now apply to military procurement. In many ways these laws contain obstacles to good management.

These are highly technical statutes. Since this bill amends them, it is itself a rather technical bill. Its purpose, however, is not technical. It is designed to improve the laws governing military procurement to remove obstacles which they now contain to improving the management of military procurement. The bill also contains provisions designed affirmatively to stimulate such improvement.

Mr. President, following the launching of the Soviet sputnik in the fall of 1957, the Senate Preparedness Investigating Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, of which I am a member, launched an all-out inquiry into U.S. satellite and missile programs. During the Preparedness Subcommittee hearings there was testimony to the effect that the Soviets had been able to perfect their weapons development process so as to cut lead time, that is, the time required from the generation of a military requirement to the delivery of operational hardware, to one-half that of the United States. Dr. J. Sterling Livingston, of the Harvard Business School, offered several examples of this Soviet achievement. He pointed out, for example, that the Soviets had developed their Bison bomber in 4½ years compared to the 8½ years necessary to develop the B–52. It was clear, during the hearings, that a reduction in weapons procurement lead time was one of the most critical needs of our national security. In response to a question which I asked Dr. Livingston, he later wrote the committee as follows:

Because of our time-consuming military procurement process, this Nation loses much valuable time in weapons development, as compared with the Soviets. Our requisitioning and contracting procedures—involving, as they do, the solicitation and evaluation of proposals, the negotiation of contractual terms, and the review and approval of contractual documents—coupled with the division of technical authority between our military services and our weapons contractors, shackle this Nation's weapons development process with functions that do not exist under the Soviet system. Senator SALTONSTALL asked, during my testimony, whether the delays in the military procurement process were not due to requirements imposed on the military services by laws such as Public Law 413 of the 80th Congress. Although I could not recall the law by number at that time, Senator SALTONSTALL's observation was quite correct. In order to speed up the weapons procurement process and reduce procurement lead time, changes must be made in our procurement laws, as well as in the procurement procedures of the military services. For example, the legal and administrative procedures now required to negotiate military contracts must be simplified.

The bill which I am today introducing is a revised version of S. 4294, which I introduced late in the last Congress, and is an effort to accomplish the objectives Dr. Livingston defined. It was initially prepared and filed after months of study. A great deal more effort has been devoted to the bill during the recess of Congress. It has been studied carefully by the Department of Defense and other Government agencies. It has been discussed at several industrial seminars, drawing upon the leading minds in law and business in the defense procurement field. I believe it is fair to say that the revision which I am offering today combines the best judgment of many of the most experienced men in the procurement field. Although the Defense Department has not committed itself formally, it is my understanding that they are substantially in support of the basic concepts. Members of the Hoover Commission Task Force on Military Procurement have expressed keen interest in the legislation. And many of the most responsible industrial associations, representing both large and small business, have given their wholehearted backing. Congress now has the challenge to put in order our procurement laws for the needs of the critical age in which we live.

I was one of those who participated in drafting the present Armed Services Procurement Act in 1947. It was thought at the time to be a good workable act which fully served the Government's interest. Much of our experience under the act has borne out its wisdom.

But it was written in the climate of a world at peace—in the days immediately following World War II.

Since the writing of the act military technology has dramatically changed and the climate is now one of uncertain peace, of tension, and crisis.

Thus, in the space age—the era of the ballistic missiles—the capability for lightning-fast response is essential for our Nation's security.

If new-weapons development is to keep pace with our critical space age needs, procurement processes must be accelerated. Congress should not delay in discarding obsolete requirements which not only slow down the developmental process for modern weapons but also are a drain upon engineering and administrative talent and upon the taxpayer's dollars.

The bill proposes giving statutory recognition and encouragement to many practices which have been proven in the past few years to be extremely effective both in reducing weapons lead time and in encouraging efficient procurement. Congress can consider these potential benefits from the enactment of this legislation:

(a) A reduction in time-consuming, detailed supervision of military production contracts.

(b) The establishment of incentives to promote the fullest utilization of industrial ingenuity.

(c) Management responsibility for industry's part in weapons development coordinated by industry.

(d) Increased speed and efficiency in weapons development and production.

(e) Reduction of paperwork and ultimate savings to the taxpayer.

Undeniably the United States has maintained overall military superiority in the great power struggle of the cold war. We have today the necessary military strength to deter aggression—to discourage any nation from attacking us because of the knowledge that we could return upon him complete devastation.

It is this strength that we must maintain in the years ahead. If we assume that our future security depends upon our ability to maintain adequate military strength for deterrent capability—and this is a sound assumption—then lead time, the time for development of weapons from ideas to hardware, is all-critical. We can ill afford a month's or even a week's delay in vital procurement.

Our Pentagon planners can meet the challenge of the future. Industry has the ingenuity and resourcefulness. Congress must now remove the restrictions on both.

For, upon the speed and efficiency of our procurement procedures and upon our military-industrial strength may well depend the peace and security of the free world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, immediately after these remarks, an explanation of the various provisions of the bill, as well as brief articles concerning the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the explanation and articles will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 500) to amend title 10 of United States Code with respect to procurement procedures of the Armed Services, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. SALTONSTALL, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

SECTION-BY-SECTION EXPLANATION OF S. 500, 86TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION (REVISION OF S. 4294, 85TH CONG., 2D SESSION)

The provisions of the bill would amend chapters 137, 139, and 141 of title 10 of the United States Code and sections 102(e) and 106(a) of the Renegotiation Act of 1951 as follows:

Section 2 would amend section 2301 of chapter 137 by providing a new and expanded declaration of policy.

Explanation: The present policy statement in section 2301 expresses only the policy of Congress with respect to the participation of small business concerns in armed services procurement. The proposed new policy statement contained in section 2 of the bill is comprehensive and best explained by reading its full text. The policies which it declares are mirrored in the substantive provisions which would govern military procurement assuming the amendments proposed in other sections of the bill were enacted. It seems wise and highly desirable for Congress to declare comprehensively its policies regarding military procurement.

Section 3 would amend section 2304(a) of chapter 137 by specifically authorizing the use of competitive negotiation in procurement covered by such chapter.

Explanation: Section 2304(a) now authorizes negotiated procurement, with no requirement of competition therein, in 17 specified situations excepted from a general requirement that procurement purchases and contracts be made by formal advertising. Formal advertising, which is defined as a procedure in the present section 2305 of chapter 137, involves publication to all potential suppliers of an advertisement of and invitations to bid on the purchase or contract to be made, public opening of all bids received and, generally speaking, award of the purchase or contract to the lowest price responsible bidder whose bid conforms to the invitations. Competitive negotiation is a method of negotiated procurement which affords competition. It has been evolved administratively by the agencies and is used in much of their negotiated procurement made under the 17 exceptions listed in section 2304(a). Section 3 of the bill would in effect require its use where practicable. Competitive negotiation would be defined as a procedure by an amendment to sec. 2305 proposed by sec. 4 of the bill.)

Principally because of the novelty and increasing complexity of advanced weapons needed by the armed services, the services have found it necessary to resort to negotiation rather than formal advertising in most of their procurement. For the past few years, over 85 percent of the dollars spent for military procurement have been by negotiation rather than formal advertising.

From this it may be seen that the present section 2304(a) states as the legal rule for military procurement what has of necessity in practice become the exception. The bill's proposed amendment of section 2304(a) would restore logic to the law by authorizing and requiring the use of competitive negotiation as a proper method of procurement alternative to formal advertising whenever the degree of competition afforded by the latter is not practicable. (The bill is not designed to reduce the present requirement or use of formal advertising.) Unqualified negotiation would be continued as presently provided for use, with no requirement of competition, in the 17 situations listed, when no competition is possible or when overriding considerations, based essentially on military requirements, preclude competition.

The chief practical virtue of the bill's proposed revision of section 2304(a) is twofold. First, it would, when read with the policy declared in section (b) of the new declaration of policy proposed in section 2 of the bill, require such competition of whatever kind and degree (through formal advertising or competitive negotiation) is consistent with the needs of the military departments, the character of the products and services being procured, and the commercial or industrial environment of such products. The law now requires no competition in negotiated procurements, i.e., where formal advertising is not required. Accordingly, the proposed revision of section 2304(a) would enlarge the scope of military procurement in which competition is required by law.

Second, it would permit substantial savings of time and paperwork which should translate themselves into savings of money. The reason for this is that section 2304(a) requires the making of determinations and decisions as authority to procure by negotiation under many of the 17 exceptions therein provided. These must be factually and legally adequate to justify negotiation in each instance. The making of these determinations and decisions takes considerable time and paperwork. Since the bill's proposed amendment of section 2304(a) would not require such determinations and decisions preliminary to the use of competitive negotiation, it would create a clear opportunity for eliminating paperwork and conserving time, manpower and, hopefully, money.

Section 4 would amend section 2305 or chapter 137 by providing that formally advertised procurements may be restricted to small business concerns; by defining the procedure of "competitive negotiations"; by providing that formal advertising and competitive negotiation shall be conducted under regulations of the Secretary of Defense; and by providing a general requirement that specifications in all procurements under title 10 should be written in the simplest practicable manner, in terms of performance rather than design and manufacturing details whenever practicable. (Sec. 2305 now defines the procedure of "formal advertising" in three subsections designated (a), (b) and (c) respectively. It also provides in subsection (d) that any bid received in formal advertising which evidences a violation of the antitrust laws shall be

Section 4(a) would redesignate section 2305(a) as 2305(a)(1) and amend it by the addition of a proviso that procurement by formal advertising may be restricted to small business concerns by unilateral action of an agency.

Explanation: Such restriction may in effect be achieved under present law in two ways: (1) by means of the set-aside procedure provided in section 15 of the Small Business Act, which contains a requirement of joint determination by the Small Business Administration and the procuring agency as a precondition to such restriction, and (2) in procurement made under one of the negotiation exceptions found in section 2304(a) of chapter 137, as to which no competition is required.

The two present methods available for restricting an advertised procurement to small business concerns are respectively administratively complicated by (1) the need for joint determinations made by the Small Business Administration and the procuring agency, and (2) the need to make determinations and decisions as required for negotiated procurements under section 2304(a) of chapter 137. It seems highly desirable and consistent with existing congressional policy regarding small business participation in Government procurement to provide authority for a procuring agency to make an advertised procurement restricted to small business concerns by unilateral and unconditional action of such agency. Such new method will afford opportunity for simplifying and, hopefully, increasing small business participation in formally advertised procurement.

Section 4(b) would repeal section 2305(b) which reads as follows:

"(b) The specifications in invitations for bids must contain the necessary language and attachments, and must be sufficiently descriptive in language and attachments to permit full and free competition. If the specifications in an invitation for bids do not carry the necessary descriptive language and attachments, or if those attachments are not accessible to all competent and reliable bidders, the invitation is invalid and no award may be made."

Explanation: The repeal of the section just quoted is proposed because by its terms, its legislative history, and its administrative application, the section stresses the use of overly detailed specifications. (See discussion of sec. 4(f) of the bill.)

Section 4(c) would redesignate section 2305(c) as subsection 2305(a)(2).

Section 4(d) would insert a new section 2305(b), divided into subsections (1), (2), and (3), which would define the procedure of competitive negotiation.

Explanation: The principal differences between formal advertising and competitive negotiation are as follows:

1. In formal advertising the advertisement is made to all potential bidders so as to afford as nearly as possible "free and full competition." In competitive negotiation requests for proposals need be made only to "two or more sources."

2. In formal advertising the emphasis is on price competition, and award is generally made to the lowest responsible bidder, with no negotiation relating to the purchase after the opening of bids. In competitive negotiation, because of the Government's comparative uncertainty about the purchase being made thereby: competition with respect to factors other than price is essential; negotiations after the receipt and review of proposals is frequently necessary; and award is sometimes made to other than the lowest price offeror.

Since competitive negotiation would be given statutory status by force of section 3 of the bill, it should be generally defined in procedural terms as formal advertising is. Congress will thus have furnished the Secretary of Defense with guidelines for the issuance of more detailed regulations.

Section 4(e) would redesignate section 2305(d) as section 2305(c) and amend it to extend to a proposal received during competitive negotiation the requirement which it now provides that a bid received after formal advertising evidencing an antitrust law violation be referred to the Attorney General.

Explanation: The requirement of referring possible antitrust violations evidenced by bids received on formal advertising should apply equally to such violations evidenced by proposals received during competitive negotiation.

Section 4(f) would insert two new sections 2305(d) and (e). Section 2305(d) would require that formal advertising and competitive negotiation be conducted under regulations of the Secretary of Defense. Section 2305(e) would require that property procured under title 10 be identified in specifications which shall express the characteristics of the property in the simplest practicable manner, consistent with the needs of the procuring agency, the nature of the property, the Defense cataloging and standardization programs, and wherever practicable in terms of performance rather than design and manufacturing details.

Explanation: The proposed new section 2305(d) is designed to assure that formal advertising and competitive negotiation will be conducted as uniformly as practicable by all procuring agencies. Also, the provision will foreclose the possibility of having these procedures defined by any Government agency outside the Department of Defense which would not be as sensitive to the needs of military procurement.

The proposed new section 2305(e) is designed to stimulate the military departments to simplify their specification procedures. There is considerable opinion and evidence that much manpower, time, and money could be conserved, and paperwork eliminated, by cutting down on the preparation of detailed design and manufacturing specifications. Furthermore, the use of such specifications increases the need for close supervision and time-consuming review and approval of engineering and manufacturing changes by personnel of the procuring agency. Specifications emphasizing performance characteristics tend to speed the performance of the work involved by vesting in the contractor greater responsibility for engineering and manufacturing judgment. Furthermore, their use tends to enlarge the segment of industry which can bid on military procurement and thereby broadens the base for competition and supply and thus tends to lower procurements costs.

The specifications for military procurement must be expressed in terms consistent with the requirements defined by the services and consistent with their other needs, including standardization for logistic support and training; however, we cannot afford to waste skilled manpower, time, or money by the preparation and use of overly detailed specifications.

Section 5(a) would amend section 2306(a) of chapter 137 by changing the word "may" to "shall" in the second sentence thereof, and changing the word "any" to "the" in such sentence.

Explanation: The effect of the proposed amendment is to require the head of an agency, rather than simply to permit him, as the present wording of the section does, to make, under section 2304, the kind of contract that he considers will promote the best interests of the United States.

Section 5(b) would amend section 2306(c) of chapter 137 by specifically and without qualification authorizing the use of cost contracts or cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts for experimental, developmental, or research work and by deleting therefrom the reference, in the nature of a qualified prohibition, to making incentive contracts.

Explanation: Section 2306(c) now prohibits the use of cost contracts, cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts and incentive contracts except when it is determined that such contracts are likely to be less costly than other kinds or that it is impracticable to obtain the kind or quality of property or services required by other kinds of contracts. Section 5(b) of the bill would eliminate this qualified prohibition as applied to incentive contracts thereby in effect permitting their use without a specific conditions precedent. Section 5(b) would also specifically authorize the use of cost and cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts for experimental, developmental, or research work. Such contracts cannot now be used for such work under section 2306(c) unless one of the determinations mentioned above is made.

Cost or cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts are of necessity the kind predominantly used for procuring experimental, developmental, or research work. For this reason it seems desirable for the law to authorize, rather than to conditionally prohibit, the use of such contracts for such procurement. Thus, opportunity would be afforded to conserve time and effort by eliminating the making of determinations now required as a condition for their use. (The necessity for making such determinations as a condition to the use of cost contracts in other procurement would be unaffected by the proposed amendment of sec. 2306(c).)

Incentive-type contracts are very widely used because of the variety of ways they afford to lower costs, improve quality and performance, and reduce time in military procurement. Therefore it is not sensible for the law to tend to discourage their use by conditionally prohibiting them; nor should the law interpose the administrative burden of making determinations as a condition to their use. It is for these reasons that section 5(b) of the bill would delete reference to use of incentive contracts from section 2306(c).

Section 5(c) would add a new section 2306(f)(1) authorizing the head of an agency to designate, in prime contracts, subcontracting areas to be restricted by the prime contractor to competition among qualified small business concerns and (2) providing for regulations to be issued by the Secretary of Defense to implement such authority.

Explanation: The insertion of new section 2306(f) would provide explicit statutory authority, nowhere in law now provided, for the head of an agency to require in any prime contract that the prime contractor restrict to small business concerns competition in his procurement of property so specified in his contract. The insertion of such a provision would eliminate any question as to whether such authority exists. It would thereby afford opportunity for efficiently enlarging small business participation in military procurement parallel to the opportunity afforded by the amendment to section 2305(a) proposed in section 4(a) of the bill.

Section 6 would amend section 2311 of chapter 137 by authorizing the head of an agency to delegate his power to make determinations and decisions under clauses (11)-(15) of section 2304(a) and section 2307(a).

Explanation: Section 2311 now permits only a very limited delegation by the head of an agency of his power to make determinations and decisions under clause (11) of section 2304(a), and it completely prohibits such delegation of determinations and decisions under clauses (12)-(15) of section 2304(a). These clauses provide five of the so-called negotiation exceptions from the general requirement that purchases be made by formal advertising and require determinations and decisions as follows: (11) That the property and services to be procured are for experimental, developmental, or research work; (12) that the procurement should not be publicly disclosed; (13) that the procurement is for technical equipment which must be standardized and interchangeable; (14) that the property to be procured requires a substantial initial investment or an extended period of preparation for manufacture, and that formal advertising might require duplication of investment or preparation already made or would unduly delay the procurement; (15) that the bid prices received after formal advertising are unreasonable or were not independently reached in open competition.

Section 2311 also now prohibits delegation by the head of an agency of his power to make the determination and decision under section 2307(a) that advance payments on a negotiated contract are desirable.

Section 6 of the bill would make all such powers of determination unqualifiedly delegable.

The nature of the determinations and decisions described above is not such that the head of an agency is uniquely qualified within his agency to make them. The prohibition on their delegation causes unnecessary time delays and paperwork in the procurements to which they apply. Accordingly, they should be made delegable, as section 6 would provide, so as to afford agency heads the opportunity to increase efficiency in the management of such procurements.

Section 7 would amend chapter 141 of title 10 by adding a new section 2389 thereto covering the procurement of operational systems.

Explanation: Section 7 is best explained by reading its full text. Its purpose is to provide specific statutory authority, encouragement and guidelines for the use of the so-called weapon system method of managing procurement of advanced weapons and other operational systems as defined in the section. The term "operational system" is used, instead of "weapon system" to reflect the encompassing therein of combinations of facilities and equipments which are not weapons.

Operational system procurement contemplates centralization of responsibility both on the military department side and on the industrial contractor side of the contract. It is a style of procurement management which was developed administratively by the Air Force. Starting in 1954, the Air Force has used it in a variety of procurements, with considerable efficacy in reducing "lead time," the period from the definition of a military requirement to the delivery of an operational inventory.

The proposed new provision for operational system contracts is designed to safeguard against the potentially troublesome aspects of this method of procurement management, such as undue concentration of performance of the work under the contract, as distinct from management responsibility therefor, in the hands of the prime contractor; jeopardizing fulfillment of programs of standardization of facilities and equipments, logistic support and training; inadequacy of competition in subcontracting under the prime contract. The provision is also designed to assure that there will be coordination of operational system procurement among the military departments and opportunity for small business concerns to participate in the work covered by operational system contracts.

The Congress has a responsibility to give the operational system concept specific statutory status, to integrate it into congressional policies relating to military procurement, and to prescribe for its use in sufficient detail so that it will be used effectively to implement such policies.

Section 8 contains miscellaneous technical provisions which would make various amendments to sections of chapters 137 and 139 which are necessary or desirable to conform to the changes provided in other sections of the bill.

Section 9(a) would amend the Renegotiation Act of 1951 to exempt from renegotiation all the following contracts made under chapter 137 of title 10: (1) Fixed price contracts; (2) contracts made after formal advertising; and (3) incentive contracts. The procedures for making and administering such contracts are designed to produce a price which does not include any payment to the contractor which can properly be said to include "excessive profits" in conformance with the policy of the Congress declared in the Renegotiation Act of 1951. Accordingly, the contracts should not be subject to renegotiation. To subject any such contract to renegotiation, as it done by present law, subjects the contractor to speculative, potentially inequitable, costly and time-consuming second-guessing of his relationship with the military department. Any necessary price redetermination should be negotiated between the contractor and the procuring agency after all costs under a contract have been ascertained. The military departments have the necessary authority to do this. We must design our military procurement laws in such a way as to maximize the incentives for industry to want to do and to do a good job. Amendment of the Renegotiation Act in the manner provided by section 9(a) of the bill is proposed to serve this objective.

Section 9(b) is in the nature of a technical provision necessary to carry out the purpose of section 9(a). It would amend section 102(e) of the Renegotiation Act of 1951 so as to provide that the profit-limitation provisions of the so-called Vinson-Trammell Act (now secs. 2382 and 7300 of title 10 of the United States Code), which are made inapplicable by such section 102(e) to contracts which are subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1951, will also be inapplicable to contracts which would be subject to such act but for the new exemption added by section 9(a) of the bill.

Section 9(c) provides that the amendments proposed in sections 9(a) and (b) would apply to contracts and related subcontracts made on or after the effective date of the bill.

Section 10 provides that the provisions of the bill would take effect 3 months after its enactment.

SALTONSTALL'S BILL PROMISES RELIEF FOR DEFENSE PROCUREMENT HEADACHES

(By Henry Lefer)

WASHINGTON.—Military and industry procurement officials, accustomed to taking a beating from Congress, were pleasantly surprised during the closing days of the 85th Congress by the introduction of a bill that approaches the problem of procurement difficulties and delays constructively.

Sponsored by Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL (Massachusetts), ranking Republican member of the Armed Services Committee, the bill was introduced in the last days of the session with the intention that it be studied during adjournment and come up for action early next year.

The bill is a professional mixture of the bitter with the better, and is sure to make nobody completely happy. But balancing the gains and the losses, it will leave everybody somewhat better off than before and should accomplish its main purposes: Streamlining the procurement process and reducing the lead time required to develop weapon systems.

Proposed as an amendment to the United States Code, the bill would:

Extend the weapon system procurement concept to all major military operational systems.

Require that major primes holding weapon system contracts extend full subcontract opportunities to small business and follow Government procedures with respect to small business participation in subcontracts.

Put competitive negotiation on a par with formal advertising as a preferred way of doing business.

Require the use of functional or performance specifications, rather than the presently required detailed specifications wherever possible in formally advertised or competitively negotiated procurements.

Require that incentive or fixed-price contracts be used wherever possible.

Exempt incentive, as well as fixed-price and formal advertised contracts, from Renegotiation Board proceedings.

Encourage use of commercial-type items where full and free competition is available.

Provide that contractors reimburse the Government for use of advisory engineering services of Government personnel.

WEAPON SYSTEM PROCUREMENT

The Senator's proposal that each major military operational system be developed under a single prime contractor comes at a time when the military is tending toward taking back overall control into its own hands, with development and production of major elements being handled by associate contractors.

Furthermore, small business representatives have complained that under the single-prime-contractor concept they have difficulty getting a fair share of defense business.

SALTONSTALL claims, however that "coordination and speed are served by coupling responsibility, authority, and management." And his legislation requires that major weapon system contractors provide full and free competition among persons interested in becoming subcontractors, and use the same preferential procurement procedures that rule Government prime contract relations with small business. The contractor would also have to supply the Government with a list of the companies from whom he plans to select his subcontractors.

The result will be, the Senator claims, that small business will find its share of Defense Department procurement dollars going up, even as weapon systems become larger and more complex.

COMPETITIVE NEGOTIATION

Defense procurement officials will welcome the change that puts competitive negotiation on an equal footing with formal advertised buying. Having to justify negotiated purchasing under 1 of the 17 exceptions now specified in law—a requirement that has hindered and tended to bury under redtape a legitimate and effective technique—has wasted more time than procurement people like to think about.

Hand in hand with this change is the authorization to define needs in terms of performance, rather than by detailed specs, when this appears desirable. Competitive negotiations would be advertised publicly (just as formal advertised procurements are today). Bids, based on functional or performance requirements, rather than detailed specifications, would then be evaluated competitively and the contract awarded.

The use of functional specifications will also make it easier for the Government to cut its costs through incentive-type contracts, the Senator says.

The proposed law also adds an exception, the 18th, to the requirement that all purchases be through formal advertising (or competitive negotiation, if this change is adopted). Under the new exception, the head of the procuring agency may authorize the use of noncompetitive negotiation where he determines this is necessary to insure procurement of property or services of suitable quality.

Apparently some of these provisions will do nothing but tell procurement officials it's O.K. to do what they already have been doing for some time. But the changes are extremely important, since, if adopted, they will represent a complete turnabout of Congress' attitude toward many of these techniques.

RENEGOTIATION PROCESS

Nearly everybody—except the Renegotiation Board—welcomes the provision that incentive as well as formally advertised and competitively negotiated contracts be exempt from the provisions of the Renegotiation Act.

Defense procurement officials have been pushing incentive contracts on the assumption they can lower the cost of weapons. Contractors share in efficiency savings that bring them in under their target prices, and presumably this induces them to look actively for ways of cutting costs.

But their very efficiency may cost them money, according to Senator SALTONSTALL. He sets up this possible case:

A manufacturer, through efficiency and ingenuity, reduces the cost of a particular job substantially. Under his typical incentive contract, he gets 20 percent of the saving. His year's operations are then reviewed—as much as 5 years later—at the regional and, perhaps, national renegotiation levels. The Board decides his profit was excessive for the year and recaptures the 20 percent. Apparently he has lost only the 20 percent extra he thought he had earned. However, the Senator says, after he has paid all the expenses of the administrative renegotiation procedures and perhaps the cost of litigation in appeal to the tax court, he may find that he is in worse shape than if he never had produced any saving on the contract at all.

The exemption of incentive contracts from renegotiation will save the Government money in the long run, the Senator believes, by encouraging contractors to hunt for economies.

Some observers are reluctant to see the Board completely removed from the picture. They say that some sort of watchdog is necessary to protect the Government's interests when, for example, an inexperienced or incompetent procurement officer has been fast-talked into setting the target price too high. Others answer that cases of this kind can be caught when incentive contracts include a redetermination provision, which provides that target prices be revised at a certain point in the contract when some cost experience has been accumulated.

CHARGE FOR SERVICES

The Senator told Aeronautical Procurement that the provision that the contractor reimburse the Government for use of advisory engineering services of Government personnel will eliminate much redtape and put many procurements on a more truly competitive basis.

By, in effect, putting these personnel on the contractor's payroll, it would permit assigning them to his plant or project where they could give faster decisions and clearances than he can get now, and with a minimum of paperwork.

Presumably, on cost or incentive contracts, Uncle Sam would still be the one who ultimately got the bill for these services. But putting them out into the open would end the practice of bidding low in the expectation of using free Government help. This would enable contracting officials to compare bids on a sounder basis, the Senator says.

OBJECTIONS

Objections to the bill have centered on three main aspects:

Extension of the weapon system prime contractor concept. Pentagon and military sources say this could prove unduly restrictive, prefer to be free to tailor their procurement approach to the particular project.

Elevation of negotiation to equal status with formal advertising. There is a strong group in Washington that feels the surest way to get a good buy is through a formal advertisement based on fully defined specifications.

Requirement that prime contractor relations with subcontractors be ruled by the same small business regulations that govern Federal procurement. The primes say they already follow these procedures on large subcontracts anyhow, and writing it into law this way would hamper and restrict them.

Despite the objections to individual provisions, overall reaction to the bill has been favorable, and its prospects appear to be good. It would go into effect 2 months after adoption.

BATTLE COMING ON DEFENSE BUYING

Pressure will be on Congress next year to revamp controversial military procurement practices so the United States can get weapons faster and cheaper.

Our national safety and private enterprise incentives as well as a $22 billion-a-year defense shopping list are involved in the procurement issue.

Whether the aging and much-amended procurement laws will be overhauled is not certain, but already the ramparts are being erected and ammunition gathered for a possible battle next year.

A House Armed Services Subcommittee plans hearings this fall on the Procurement Act and contracting methods, while the Senate Armed Services Committee is making a staff study which could lead to hearings next winter when Congress returns to Washington.

Several key proposals aimed at reforming procurement practices have support in industry and at the Pentagon. These proposals are embodied in a bill by Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, top Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee. His measure was introduced near the end of Congress and will be introduced in similar form when Congress convenes. These proposals will be in the thick of any controversy next year:

1. Expand the weapons system concept of procurement: The Armed Services Preparedness Subcommittee brought out in hearings last winter that, in many cases, 10 years have elapsed between the determination of a military requirement and delivery of the item. However, in the past few years, delivery of military hardware has been quicker and more efficient under what is known as weapons system procurement. Instead of contracting with a number of component makers to build parts for a weapon with detailed specifications, a military service picks a prime contractor who assumes responsibility and authority and gets the job done through his own and subcontractors' resources. The Thor missile, for example, was developed under this system of central responsibility in a matter of months.

However, it is estimated less than half of the dollar amount of contracting is done now in this fashion. Instead responsibility is often spread over multiple committees and commands. Decision making is so divided that creative contributions of industry are discouraged by the necessity to justify the most minute change or innovation at considerable expense and delay.

2. Use performance standards instead of detailed specifications: Fantastically detailed specifications are drawn for even the simplest defense supplies in accord with the Armed Services Procurement Act. The specifications sometimes take years to prepare.

Specifications for a self-locking nut, for example, cover 34 pages. An electric cable takes 103 pages to describe. The specifications for an Army field jacket are detailed in 21 pages. And requirements for an electronic tube take 190 pages to list.

The proponents of detailed specifications insist that if an armed service calls for an item in general terms it could be delivered in many cases by a large corporation which already manufactures some commercial product similar to what is wanted. This would give big business an edge in obtaining procurement business. But if a product has to be tailor made, small and big businesses compete for the business on equal terms, or so says the argument.

Detailed specifications, however, have hurt more than one small business. A small canning plant in Maine had a contract to provide sardines for the Navy. The contract specified that at least a certain number of sardines had to be in each can, and each can a specific size. Sardines were running bigger that year, however. So to get the required number in each can meant packing the cans till they bulged. The Navy figured the contents were spoiled and that was what bloated the cans, so the sardines were rejected. By the time the specifications were revised, the company reportedly lost so much money because of rejections it had to fold.

3. Use commercial type items when possible: Custom-made items are often more expensive than commercial products and take longer to get. There is the case of the cooling system for a jet fighter's electronic equipment which took months to design and develop. Then it was discovered that the specifications were incorrectly prepared and had to be redone. After 2 years, the military finally bought a cooling system that had been on the market commercially all the time.

4. Make maximum use of incentive and fixed-price contracts: Research contracts usually are negotiated on a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis, since few precedents exist on which to base costs. This form of profit guarantee, despite the actual cost involved, eliminates a contractor's incentive to economize and do the job as efficiently and quickly as possible.

Critics of the cost-plus type contract point out that ingenuity and efficiency of American industry are penalized when no incentives are offered to produce the best weapon as quickly and as inexpensively as possible.

In recent years, the incentive-type contract has been used more frequently. With this type of contract, a target price is set for an item to be made. If the contractor succeeds in making the item at less than target cost, he turns over a fixed percentage—usually 80 percent—of the savings to the Government and gets to keep 20 percent. If he exceeds the target price, he must pay 20 percent of the excess cost and the Government 80 percent.

5. Exempt some contracts from Renegotiation Board proceedings: Under the Renegotiation Act of 1951, a defense contractor who does $1 million or more of business with the military is subject, with certain exceptions, to Renegotiation Board proceedings. His profits are examined later to see if they are excessive.

Often the provisions of incentive or fixed-price contracts are negated by renegotiation. Under a typical incentive contract, an airplane manufacturer, for instance, saved $10 million by making a plane under the price the Government set as reasonable. The Government received $8 million as a result of the contractor's economies. The contractor got $2 million of the savings. But years later he was required to go before the Renegotiation Board and not only forfeit much of the 20 percent of savings, but pay out large sums in accountant and legal costs.

Many small defense contractors refuse to accept more than a limited amount of military work because they can't afford the costs of renegotiation at some later time.

At present the Renegotiation Board is 5 years behind in some cases.

6. Assure subcontracting opportunities for all businesses: Small business is given certain privileges to make sure it gets a share in defense contract awards. However, most small firms would be ineligible for prime contracts where the weapons system concept is feasible. Therefore, the Saltonstall proposals suggest that subcontract opportunities be expanded for small business by requiring prime contractors under the weapons system concept to follow Government procedures now in existence for making maximum use of small businesses.

7. Give Pentagon more flexibility in picking prime contractors: The Armed Services Procurement Act requires procurement through advertised bidding except in certain instances when procurement by negotiation is permitted.

Advertising for bids provides maximum competition and a low price on items made by a number of possible contractors. But it has certain disadvantages. It can't be used for classified items or where there are no fixed specifications. It can't be used to obtain contractors with specific talents or facilities. Soliciting in accord with predetermined specifications also prevents the contribution of new knowledge or techniques. The formal bidding procedure generally is more time consuming and costly since detailed specifications must be written and bids must be evaluated.

In cases where negotiated procurement is allowed, the Pentagon has used open and competitive negotiation with success. Under this technique, the Government's needs are made known to a narrower group of potentially available and eligible contractors. Negotiation then takes place over a bargaining table with much greater speed and at lower overhead costs and in many cases lower prices.

AIA ENDORSES SALTONSTALL BILL

WASHINGTON.—Representatives of Department of Defense, the three military services, and the Aircraft Industries Association, have endorsed the major provisions of comprehensive procurement legislation proposed by Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, Republican, Massachusetts (Aviation Week, Aug. 18, p. 26).

Suggested changes were primarily to make the measure more workable and flexible to administer, less mandatory.

The legislation, introduced in the closing days of Congress last summer, provides:

Competitive negotiation would be encouraged to the same extent that contract by formal advertised bid is now, with consideration being given to quality as well as price. AIA's representative suggested that suitability also should be considered.

Performance specifications would replace the elaborate detailed specifications now required for even minor weapons. Defense and AIA representatives suggested that the matter be left discretionary to suit individual cases.

Fixed price or incentive type contracts would be the rule, unless another type contract were specifically authorized by the agency head. AIA representative wanted the type further detailed, since Defense now has a wide variety of fixed and incentive contracts.

Decentralization of military supervision of research and development contracts would be encouraged and contractors would pay for advisory engineering services detailed to a specific project for the purpose of eliminating the numerous layers of review and approval now required. Both AIA and Defense representatives opposed reimbursement by the contractor.

Weapon system procurement concept would be expanded to all major military operational systems. Since operational systems is virtually impossible to define, there was general agreement by Defense and AIA representatives and SALTONSTALL'S staff that use of the concept should be discretionary. The net result would be a provision which would simply give weapon-system procurement legal status.

AIA has proposed elimination of two highly controversial provisions included in last summer's version of SALTONSTALL'S bill—renegotiation (see p. 24) and small business.

In the small-business provision, SALTONSTALL'S measure would require prime contractors to give preferential treatment to increase the participation of small-business concerns in defense procurement. AIA, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and other industry organizations are vigorously opposed to this. It would require prime contractors to assume the obligations toward small business now assumed by Defense Department, such as reviewing each contract for subcontract set-asides exclusively for small firms.

Failure to safeguard small-business interests will mean strong opposition to the Saltonstall measure by the influential House and Senate Small Business Committees.

DEFENSE PROCUREMENT—TRENCH-WAR POLICIES IN THE SPACE AGE

The biggest business in the land is the Government's $18-billion-a-year buying of military equipment. How well is the job being done? Says Massachusett's Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, ranking Republican member of the Senate Armed Services Committee: "The present procurement laws result in delay and unnecessary expense that our Nation can no longer afford."

When the Pentagon orders anything, from screws to tanks, it usually lays down a complex set of specifications that instruct the manufacturer, step by step, on how to make the product. This produces some fantastic bureaucratic nonsense. "Specs" for a parachute pull ring run 5 pages, SALTONSTALL found; for a ping pong ball they ran to 18 pages. They describe the obligations of the contractor, the product's materials, design, dimensions, finish, packaging, marking for shipment and storage, testing methods, etc., etc.

Specs often hobble the manufacturer at every step, even though he knows far better than Government buyers how to make the product. When the services ordered furniture from the Kroehler Manufacturing Co., which has been producing furniture for 43 years, they instructed Kroehler on every detail, down to what kind of sandpaper had to be used to smooth the unseen insides. What is worse, each of the three services has different specs for ordinary chairs, and some of the specs are 30 years old. Though it would be far simpler and cheaper for the United States to buy furniture—and many another such item—from civilian stocks "off the shelf," diehard Pentagon planners argue that book-length specifications are necessary if the United States is to get its dollar's worth. But one top procurement officer admits that even the lengthiest specs are no guard against a dishonest supplier, since "even if we lay down 100 specification details, a sharpster can usually find a way to cheat on them."

So busy is the Pentagon writing specifications on exactly how a manufacturer is to make an item that it frequently overlooks the all-important thing: how well the product itself should perform. One west coast producer complained to Washington that if he followed the production specs on a certain electronics contract, the product would not work. But the Pentagon told him to go ahead anyhow and fill the contract, then apply for another cost-plus contract to make a gadget that would work.

Contractors complain that the production specifications not only are written by theoreticians who have never built anything, but are often enforced in contracts by inexperienced, underpaid Government negotiators who do not understand production problems, thus follow the contracts to the letter, are afraid to use better methods found in the course of manufacturing. Even minor problems take months to solve because local negotiators pass them to Washington for a decision. "It's the old civil service routine," says one planemaker. "Government negotiators know that the quickest way to get into trouble is to make a decision—so they pass it up to higher levels."

Many of the snafus stem from the fact that the best producer is often turned down in favor of the cheapest producer. The procurement statutes say that, whenever possible, the United States must advertise for what it needs and then select the lowest bidder even though the lowest bid often comes from a marginal producer with limited experience, poor management, or inadequate financing. One Pentagon official estimates that 85 percent of the advertised-bid contracts hit some kind of snag in production, thus become costlier in the long run.

To eliminate some of these evils, Congress last month passed a law to cut procurement paperwork, increase the number of contracts that may be let by simple negotiation between Government and contractor. But Senator SALTONSTALL proposed a far broader bill in the closing days of Congress so that the Armed Services Committee could study it and consider action in the next session. Senator SALTONSTALL wants to shift much of the Pentagon's procurement responsibility to private enterprise by using the weapons system form of procurement that has been successfully tried with such weapons as the Jupiter and Thor missiles. This method calls for the Government to set the performance standards for a weapon, then select one prime contractor to be responsible for the project; the prime in turn lets subcontracts to other manufacturers, and it is his job to make sure they produce fast and well.

In addition, the Saltonstall bill would (1) replace detailed manufacturing specifications with simple performance requirements, (2) empower local negotiators to make decisions that are now made in Washington, (3) emphasize quality as much as cost in selecting a producer, and (4) encourage negotiated contracts rather than letting them by advertised bidding.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the appointment of two additional district judges for the northern district of Illinois, thus raising the number of judgeships for the district from 8 to 10.

The provisions of this bill are recommended by the Judicial Conference of the United States. Previously, in the 84th Congress, the Judicial Conference of the United States had recommended the creation of one additional district judgeship for the northern district of Illinois, and in its meeting of March 14 and 15, 1957, the Conference changed its recommendation from one to two additional district judgeships for the northern district of Illinois.

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary in its recommendation in regard to the northern district of Illinois in the 84th and 85th Congresses recommended the addition of two additional district judgeships for that district. This provision has been the subject of hearings in both the 84th and 85th Congresses, and the evidence adduced clearly indicates that the addition of the two additional district judgeships for the northern district of Illinois is amply justified.

The volume of civil business in this district is heavy. Because Chicago is the economic and industrial capital of the Middle West, as well as the second most populous city in the United States, the district court receives many difficult and unusual cases. During 6 of the last 10 fiscal years, approximately 2,000 civil cases were filed annually. In the other 4 years of this period the filings were higher; in 1949, over 2,200; in 1952 and 1953, 2,567 and 2,946, respectively; and in 1956, over 2,600. The years 1954 and 1955 saw a substantial reduction, with filings down to the 2,000 mark, but in 1956 the civil cases went up again to 2,600 as the result of a sixfold increase in Government contract actions, mostly suits to recover overpayments, which are generally not time consuming. With the U.S. price and rent control suits deducted in 1952 and 1953, which amounted to 467 and 719, respectively, the district for the 10 years prior to 1956 showed a surprisingly stable total of civil filings around 2,000 annually with only minor variations.

The metropolitan character and other factors peculiar to the district leave their mark on the types of civil suits instituted. As the largest railroad center of the world, the district receives many Federal Employer's Liability Act cases, which have averaged about 100 per year for the last 10 years. Because of peculiarities in the law of criminal procedure in the State of Illinois, a great many habeas corpus cases have been filed by State prisoners. A few years ago this district had more Federal question habeas corpus cases than all other districts combined. For the last 3 years they have averaged around 90 per year. In 1947, 238 were filed. Considerable patent litigation arises in this district; cases of this nature have numbered between 50 and 75 yearly for the last 10 years. This gives each judge a patent caseload 3 times greater than the average for the 86 districts. There has been a continued and steady increase in cases filed under the diversity-of-citizenship jurisdiction during the past 10 years. Contract and insurance actions, which numbered 119 in 1946, were 405 in 1956. Suits to recover damages due to injuries received in motor-vehicle accidents rose from 85 in 1946 to 376 in 1956. Other types of personal-injury suits in the diversity category have risen from 95 to 270 during the same period.

A complete résumé of the business in this district is found in the "Statistics and Judicial Business of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois," as submitted to the Judiciary Committee from the Statistical Division of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 503) to provide for the appointment of additional district judges for the Northern District of Illinois, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 239, IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend section 239 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes.

In short, this proposal would permit the confiscation of airplanes which are apprehended or found to have been engaged in smuggling aliens into the United States. It would place airplanes in the same category with ships and other vehicles if caught smuggling persons or property into the United States.

One of the hazards to our internal security program is the comparative ease with which private and commercial aircraft can cross our borders for the purpose of illegally landing aliens in the interior of the United States. Not only does this constitute a security risk, but this means of smuggling so-called wetbacks into the United States poses a particularly difficult enforcement problem for the Attorney General of the United States.

Much progress has been made in recent years toward reducing the number of migrant workers entering the United States illegally. Enforcement of existing statutes, together with certain changes in organization, methods, and techniques within the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Justice have greatly contributed to this result. However, additional legislation is needed, and the bill I am now proposing will constitute a further effective deterrent to the smuggling of aliens into the United States.

As a separate penalty, in addition to the fine and imprisonment prescribed by the Immigration and Nationality Act for unlawfully bringing aliens into this country, the forfeiture of aircraft so used should be authorized.

Under existing law, the owner or operator of an aircraft which violates designated sections of the immigration laws is subject to various administrative penalties. In addition, some sections of the Immigration and Nationality Act, for example sections 257 and 271, provide that the fine for violation shall be a lien upon the aircraft—or vessel—which may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel. Section 239 of the Immigration and Nationality Act permits the imposition of a $500 civil penalty against an aircraft for certain violations, and authorizes seizure of the aircraft to insure payment of that penalty. The aircraft may be released, however, upon deposit of a bond, conditioned upon payment of the fine. Seizures or liens generally may be avoided or removed by payment of a money fine, usually for less than the value of a plane. In one section, dealing with travel and control in time of war or national emergency—section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act—provision is made for forfeiture of a vehicle concerned in a violation. As it now reads, however, that forfeiture is supplemental to and conditioned upon a criminal conviction of the individual or corporate violator of that section of law.

There is no existing provision for total forfeiture of an aircraft as a penalty for violating the alien-smuggling provisions of the statute.

This proposal would provide that any aircraft used in violation of section 274(a)(1) or section 274(a)(4) of the Immigration and Nationality Act shall be seized and forfeited to the United States. Aircraft used as a common carrier would not be subject to forfeiture if the illegal act was committed while the plane was unlawfully in the possession of the smuggler. The Attorney General would be authorized to designate officers of the Department of Justice, or the United States generally, who could seize the aircraft. All the provisions of law relating to seizure, forfeiture, and condemnation under the customs laws would apply under this measure, the Attorney General being vested with duties and powers similar to those possessed by the Secretary of the Treasury or the collector of customs acting in the enforcement of the customs laws.

The Attorney General would be authorized to prescribe the necessary rules and regulations for the implementation of this proposal. It should be made clear that this legislation is supplemental to and not in substitution for other provisions of law dealing with fines, penalties, and forfeitures. A statute similar in style to this proposal and having a comparable purpose is the act of August 9, 1939—53 Stat. 1291; 49 U.S.C. 781 et seq.—relating to seizure and forfeiture of carriers transporting contraband.

This proposal has the approval of the Attorney General of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 504) to amend section 239 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM BILL, 1959

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, the labor-management reform bill for 1959.

It is my intention to hold prompt hearings on this and related bills, and seek early passage by the Senate and the Congress of an effective measure that will protect workers, employers, honest unions, and the general public from the unscrupulous or dictatorial tactics of the few racketeers. As this bill is considered, I hope several facts will be kept in perspective:

First. This is a bipartisan measure on a nonpartisan subject. Today's bill is a revised version of the measure which passed the Senate last year by a vote of 88 to 1—a bill which was supported by every Member of this body today who was here a year ago, regardless of party.

I also wish to pay tribute to the outstanding work of former Senator Ives, of New York, in connection with this measure. His contribution to labor-management reform legislation will be long and favorably remembered. His conviction as to the necessity for bipartisanship in labor legislation is a principle which should guide us all.

I am taking the liberty of quoting from a letter received by me this week from former Senator Ives:

I wish you every success in your effort to get this vital legislation on our statute books. This bill represents many months of careful study in committee, the collective judgment of the U.S. Senate as expressed in 5 days and nights of debating and voting, and many, many years of collective experience in the field of labor-management legislation.

Furthermore, it is designed to meet the objectives set forth in the report of the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. It is my firm conviction that this bill not only meets those objectives but does so in a fashion that makes it corrective rather than punitive legislation, a measure which will correct abuses without undermining the rights of working men and women.

It is my earnest prayer that, this time, the bill will go through both Houses of Congress without becoming a political football. Throughout my legislative career, I dealt with labor-management matters on a nonpartisan basis because I early learned that it was the only way with which to deal with such matters on a realistic, constructive and equitable basis. The Kennedy-Ives bill is such a nonpartisan measure and deserves nonpartisan consideration and nonpartisan action.

Second. This bill is stronger and clearer than the 1958 version. The Kennedy-Ives bill of 1958, even after it passed the Senate by a vote of 88 to 1, was subject to fantastic distortion by extremists on both sides. Fears of its effects, particularly among businessmen, were unnecessarily aroused by the misinterpretation of isolated sections. To allay such fears and prevent further distortion, the bill has been revised to make it clear that the employer reporting section cannot possibly interfere with normal personnel relations or communications, and that the section on bribes by employers cannot possibly include wage or other normal payments. At the same time, the bill has been strengthened and tightened in other respects—including, for example, the judicial remedies here made available to a rank-and-file member to recover misappropriated dues when his union will not sue; the wider applicability of the provision for union democracy and secret election of officers; and the increased reporting of improper payments to a union or its officers by an employer.

Third. This is primarily a labor-management reform bill, dealing with the problems of dishonest racketeering—it is not a bill on industrial relations, dealing with the problems of collective bargaining and economic power. The two areas of legislation should not be confused or combined. The McClellan committee has been concerned chiefly, as its title states, with "improper activities"—with corruption, conflicts of interest, unethical and undemocratic practices. We have not been concerned primarily with unfair labor practices, union security arrangements and collective bargaining rights, as long as the improprieties I have mentioned were not involved. There are, to be sure, amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act which are necessary to curb racketeering or to facilitate the NLRB's action in this area, and which were approved by the Senate as a part of this bill last year. There are other amendments—such as those dealing with economic strikers and the building trades—which were included as part of last year's package at the insistence of Secretary Mitchell and the Labor and Public Welfare Committee's ranking Republican, former Senator Smith of New Jersey, and which, having wide acceptance as a part of that same package, are included in the bill again this year. But the broad, controversial issues of labor-management relations which that act poses are improperly the subject of an antiracketeering bill, and can only impede its consideration and passage on its own merits.

I hope, therefore, that this bill will not again be criticized by either labor or management for what it fails to do by way of Taft-Hartley amendments and new collective-bargaining rules. Let us first consider labor-management reform. Let us first stop racketeering without becoming bogged down in the heated and complex issues raised by the entire Taft-Hartley Act. Then let us consider revising that law, proceeding in the manner I outlined in a statement issued last Tuesday—by convening a panel of labor-law experts who can give our committee a fresh but experienced and well-balanced examination of these issues, outline the alternatives and isolate the areas of agreement and disagreement. I shall have more to say on this procedure at a later date.

If this Congress, in its consideration of anticorruption legislation, becomes bogged down in acrimonious controversies over broad and controversial Taft-Hartley revisions, in technical and emotional issues such as boycotts, picketing, and the section 14(b) provisions enabling State right-to-work laws, all of which must be considered this year—if our immediate problem of antiracketeering, on which there is already wide agreement, becomes tied to these other issues before the McClellan committee has made its second report and before our panel of experts has reported—then we can only delay and defeat a vital measure already thoroughly considered and debated. Broad Taft-Hartley revisions, which have been neglected too long, and including such items as boycotts, picketing, and State right-to-work laws, should definitely be considered by the Congress this year—and I can assure the Senate that a second labor bill will be reported to the floor this year with the recommendations of the McClellan committee, the Labor Committee, and our panel of experts. Then all issues can be debated and all amendments considered, with the best information available, and without endangering the passage of a strong antirackets measure.

So let us avoid these unnecessary controversies now—and let us also avoid, in considering this measure, unnecessary partisan politics or uninformed or deliberate distortions, or otherwise it should be clear from last year's record, no antirackets bill at all will pass. The gangsters and hoodlums will continue to prey upon union members and the public. And this Congress will be responsible.

Failure to pass effective reform legislation at this session may please the Hoffas, the Dios, and their ilk. It may please those on the other side who are chiefly interested in keeping a whipping boy alive. But it can only harm our Nation.

Fourth. This is a strong, effective reform bill. It carries out all of the previously unfulfilled recommendations of the McClellan committee. It is aimed at ending the abuses revealed before that committee; and adds other legislative curbs on racketeering as well. It is based upon the bill drafted last year by two members of the McClellan committee, with the strong support of the distinguished chairman of that committee himself. It is broader and stronger than any alternative proposal in this area. It is a bill designed to permit responsible unionism to operate without being undermined by either racketeering tactics or bureaucratic controls. It is designed to strike a balance between the dangers of too much and too little legislation in this field.

I realize that it is always possible to find fault in any bill—to point out omissions—to read in other meanings—or to call indefinitely for further amendments. This is particularly true in the controversial field of labor—which is precisely why no major labor legislation has been passed in the last decade. The extremists on both sides are always displeased—the technical experts will always disagree. No doubt each Senator, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] pointed out last year, would draft his own bill differently.

But, as the Senator from Arkansas also emphasized last year, our most important responsibility is "to take what we know all of us want, and pass the bill, and then move on." The Senate did that last year by a vote of 88 to 1—demonstrating, in the words of Business Week magazine, how "wise guidance in the public interest can be substituted for concern over wide apart partisan positions."

I wish to mention the key provisions of the bill introduced today—the basic weapons against racketeering which will be unavailable in the battle against corruption if such a measure is not enacted by the Congress this year:

First. Comprehensive detailed disclosure to members, press, and public and law enforcement agencies of union financial data.

Second. Full reports by union officers on any personal conflict-of-interest transactions.

Third. Criminal sanctions for embezzlement of union funds, false reporting, false entries on books, failure to report, or destruction of union books.

Fourth. Suits by union members for recovery of funds embezzled or misappropriated by union officers.

Fifth. Prohibition of loans by employers or unions to union officers.

Sixth. Secret ballot for the election of all union officers or of the convention delegates who select them.

Seventh. Due notice of all union elections, and real opportunity to nominate opposing candidates.

Eighth. Requirement that union officers be elected by secret ballot every 4 years, by international unions; and every 3 years, by local unions.

Ninth. Prohibition on the use of union funds to support candidacy of any union officer.

Tenth. Prohibition of service as union officers of persons convicted of serious crimes.

Eleventh. Power to Secretary of Labor to institute court action to set aside improper elections, and conduct new elections.

Twelfth. Strict standards for the imposition of trusteeships and a limit of 18 months on their duration.

Thirteenth. Mandatory annual report to Secretary and union members on every trusteeship, the reasons for its establishment, continuance, and operation.

Fourteenth. Prohibition on counting votes of delegates of trustee bodies unless delegates elected by secret ballot, and on transfer of funds from trusteed local union to international except normal dues and assessments.

Fifteenth. Power to Secretary of Labor to begin a court proceeding to break improper trusteeships.

Sixteenth. Prohibition of picketing for extortion or to secure payoff from employer.

Seventeenth. Prohibition of solicitation or payment of fictitious fees for unloading cargo from interstate carriers.

Eighteenth. Public financial reports of the operations of Shefferman-type middlemen; and a prohibition of channeling bribes and improper influence through such middlemen.

Nineteenth. Elimination of the "no-man's land" problem which prevented NLRB action on local labor racketeering by directing the NLRB to exercise its full jurisdiction under the Taft-Hartley Act.

EFFECTS OF THE BILL ON THE TEAMSTERS UNION

Consider, for example, some of the effects of this bill on Mr. James Hoffa and his hoodlum associates now dominating the vital Teamsters Union. Under our form of government, no act of Congress can specify the elimination of Mr. Hoffa. Like every other citizen, he is entitled to the protection of the fifth amendment, trial by jury, and other constitutional guarantees which he may find it possible to abuse. But passage of this bill will close to Mr. Hoffa and his ilk most of the racketeering opportunities they have exploited—it will stop those practices which, based upon the testimony before our committee, it would appear Mr. Hoffa's career and power are based—and it will, in short, virtually put Mr. Hoffa and his associates out of business:

First. It will no longer be possible for the dues of Teamster members to be paid out to hoodlums posing as business agents, to be invested in improper or risky racetrack or real estate deals, or to be used by Mr. Hoffa and other officers to build their own personal financial empires without the knowledge of the members themselves—or without investigation by the press and public authorities.

Second. Mr. Hoffa would be required to disclose all of his business dealings with insurance agents handling the union's welfare funds, his private arrangements with employers, his hidden partnerships in business ventures foisted upon his members, and all other possible conflicts of interest.

Third. This bill would summarily force from office the extortionists, embezzlers, bribetakers, and other criminals who have left the penitentiary to find refuge in high positions of trust in the Teamsters Union.

Fourth. Placing a Teamster local in trusteeship would no longer be available as a means of exploiting the dues and privileges of the local members; and Mr. Hoffa would have difficulty repeating power plays such as that at Pontiac, Mich., where as a trustee, he appointed as business agents the very same officials who had been ousted by the local membership on grounds of corruption.

Fifth. Provisions in the Teamster constitution to safeguard free elections and democratic conventions will no longer be a farce, to be waived or ignored at will. Paper locals under Johnny Dio will no longer be able to cast votes in the names of nonexistent or unaware members.

Sixth. The Becks and Hoffas will find future collusion with employers vastly restricted—with no more loans from employer groups, no more attacks on rival unions through middlemen like Nathan Shefferman, and no more secrecy shrouding the use of union funds to bail out a collaborating employer.

Seventh. There will be no more shakedowns and tribute for unloading interstate trucks, no more destruction of union books, and no more falsification of union reports anywhere in the Teamster empire; and honest rank-and-file members will be able to recover funds embezzled or otherwise misappropriated.

CONCLUSION

This is, in short, a strong bill—a bipartisan measure—a bill that does the job which needs to be done without bogging down the Congress with unrelated controversies. Without doubt, the future course of our action in this area will be plagued with the usual emotional arguments, political perils, and powerful pressures which always surround this subject. But I am confident that our committee will have an effective bill before the Senate early this year; I am confident that the Senate will consider and pass such a measure in the same constructive spirit with which it passed the Kennedy-Ives bill by a vote of 88 to 1 last year; and I am equally confident that such a measure will pass the Congress and become law in 1959.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a list of nine experts who are going to consider the whole subject of appropriate revisions in the National Labor Relations Act of 1947 and report to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare later this year, so that we will have their recommendations as well as the further recommendations and second interim report of the McClellan committee before us at the time we consider legislative action.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM BILL, 86TH CONGRESS

Section 1: Contains the short title of the bill.

Section 2: Statement of findings, purposes, and policy.

TITLE I—REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

Section 101:

(a) Requires every labor organization in an industry affecting commerce to file with the Secretary of Labor a copy of its constitution and bylaws along with specific information detailing its major internal operations.

(b) Every such labor organization must also file a detailed and comprehensive report of the union's financial operations. Under this section all trade unions dealing with employers whose operations affect commerce must file reports whether or not they desire to use the facilities of the NLRB. All of the information required to be reported by present law will be reported under this section.

(c) Requires every labor organization required to report under title I to make available information in such reports to all of its members in a form prescribed by the Secretary.

(d) Permits the Secretary to exempt labor organizations with fewer than 200 members or annual gross receipts of less than $20,000 from the reporting requirements of 101(b) if he finds that such exemption would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of the act.

Section 102:

(a) Every officer or employee of a labor organization other than clerical employees, as defined by the Secretary of Labor, paid more than $5,000 in compensation and allowances in the preceding fiscal year, is required to report to the Secretary of Labor any of six specified transactions in which he may have been involved for the preceding fiscal year which might constitute a conflict of interest. Reports from a union officer or employee are required only if they have been involved in any of the transactions enumerated in the subsection.

Publicly traded securities and other securities which are publicly regulated are exempt from the reporting requirements of this section.

Section 103: Requires every employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce to file an annual report with the Secretary of Labor listing expenditures—

(1) pursuant to agreements with labor relations consultants to perform certain services.

(2) in excess of $2,500 to persuade employees not to exercise or persuade them as to the manner in which they exercise their rights to organize and bargain collectively or to obtain information about employees or labor organizations in connection with labor disputes except that reports need not be made of adjustments in wages or other employee benefits, employer newsletter and house organs, or expenditures to obtain information to be used solely in judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceedings.

The section also requires reports of loans or other payments by employers to an officer or employee of a labor organization except compensation payable as an employee, loans by State banks, and certain other exceptions.

Labor consultants are also required to file reports if they are involved in agreements to provide certain types of services.

This section does not require reports of expenditures for services to obtain information to be used before administrative agency or tribunal nor does it require reports by regular employees or employers on account of compensation paid to regular employees.

Section 104: (a) Specifies that the contents of reports and documents filed under sections 101, 102, and 103 should be public information and authorizes the Secretary to publish and use such information for statistical and research purposes, and to compile and publish studies and surveys based on the data contained in reports required to be filed under title I.

(b) Authorizes the Secretary to prescribe regulations permitting the inspection and examination by any person of the information contained in reports and documents filed under title I.

(c) Authorizes the Secretary to furnish copies of reports filed under title I upon a payment of a charge based on the cost of the service, provided that the Secretary may make available to a State agency copies of reports required to be filed under this title at no charge. Also provides that no person shall be required by State law to provide the information contained in a Federal report if a copy of such report is furnished to the State agency.

Section 105: Requires the maintenance and preservation of records and accounts of financial transactions necessary to verify reports required of union, employer, and labor-relations consultants for such periods of time as the Secretary shall prescribe.

Section 106: (a) Requires that reports required by this title be filed within 90 days of the time of enactment or 60 days after the date when any person first comes within the categories of those required to file such reports, whichever is later, and annually thereafter as the Secretary shall prescribe.

(b) Authorizes the Secretary to issue rules and regulations prescribing the form, content, and publication of reports and to prevent circumventions or evasion of reporting requirements. The Secretary is directed to provide simplified reporting forms for small unions and small business organizations but he is also given the power to require a full reporting form if he believes it desirable.

(c) Authorizes and directs the Secretary, when he has probable cause to believe that any person or labor organization has violated any provision of the title, to make an investigation, inspect records, and ascertain all of the facts relevant to the report in question. This subsection also authorizes the Secretary to make a full report to the members of a labor organization concerning the facts required to be reported, if any person or organization fails or refuses to file the reports as required.

Section 107: Forbids a labor organization to make loans to any officer or employee in excess of $1,500 and forbids employers to make any loan to an officer or an employee of a labor organization representing or seeking to represent his employees.

Section 108:

(a) and (b) Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or up to 1 year's imprisonment, or both, for willfully violating or failing to comply with any provision of title I or the rules or regulations issued thereunder, willful false statements or misrepresentations of material facts or failure to disclose information required by the title.

(c) Imposes a similar penalty upon any person who willfully destroys any books, records, reports, or statements required to be maintained under this title.

(d) Assigns personal responsibility to each person required to sign reports under sections 101 and 103 for the filing and the accuracy of statements in the reports.

Section 109:

(a) Makes the embezzlement by an officer or employee of funds or assets of an organization exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code a Federal crime, punishable by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not in excess of 5 years.

(b) Permits an individual union member to sue a union officer or employee convicted of embezzlement to recover lost property if the union itself has not instituted such a suit or refuses to sue to recover such property. A proceeding under this subsection cannot be brought except upon leave of the court, obtained upon verified application or good cause shown. The section provides for a reasonable recovery of counsel fees and the compensation of the member for expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the litigation.

Section 110:

(a) Amends chapter 101 of title 18 of the United States Code so as to punish persons making false entries or destroying the records of labor organizations with intent to injure or defraud or to mislead any person authorized by law to examine or inspect such records. Violation of this provision would be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

(b) Makes appropriate modifications in the analysis of the United States Code.

Section 111: Establishes in the Department of Labor a Commissioner of Labor Reports, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who would undertake to fulfill all the responsibilities assigned by this act to the Secretary of Labor. Authorizes the Secretary to make expenditures, fix compensation of attorneys and make other administrative arrangements.

Section 112: Amends section 302(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 so as to clarify an ambiguity which presently exists. Under present law it is illegal for an employer to pay or deliver anything of value to a representative of his employees. The purpose of these amendments to section 302 is to forbid any payment or bribe by an employer or anyone acting on his behalf, whether technically an agent or not. The demand or acceptance of such bribes is also proscribed. This section also makes unlawful the demand or acceptance of improper unloading fees from interstate truckers. This section exempts certain bona fide payments made by an employer to his employees or to representatives of his employees. It also provides that the general ban in section 302 of the Labor-Management Relations Act upon employer payments to unions is not to apply to employer payments to trust funds, in the building and construction industry, for pooled vacation benefits, or apprentice or other employee training programs. This provision is designed to remove doubts as to the propriety of such payments in this industry. However, it is not intended to cast doubt upon the legality or propriety of such payments by employers in any other industry.

TITLE II—TRUSTEESHIPS

Section 201:

(a) Requires reports by national or international unions to the Secretary within 30 days of establishment of trusteeships over subordinate unions (or within 30 days of enactment for existing trusteeships) and semiannually thereafter.

The reports are to show: the union in trusteeship, the date trusteeship established, a detailed statement of the reason for trusteeship and its continuance and the nature and extent of voting by members of the trusteed unions for convention delegates and national and international officers.

(b) Provides the Secretary with the same rulemaking and publication powers he has under title I.

(c), (d), and (e) Makes failure to report, false reports or concealment or destruction of documents or records upon which report is based by responsible officers punishable by a maximum $10,000 fine or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

(f) Provides that reports made by labor organizations under this section shall be made available to each member of the labor organization.

Section 202: Requires the establishment and administration of a trusteeship to be in conformity with the union constitution and for correcting either improper conduct, assuring the performance of agreements restoring democratic procedures, or the achievement of proper union objects.

Section 203:

(a) Makes it unlawful during trusteeship (1) to count members' votes for convention delegates or national or international officers

if not by secret ballot in which all members in good standing could participate, or (2) to transfer to parent organization any funds of the trusteed union except regular per capita and assessments payable by nontrusteed unions. It is provided that upon dissolution of the trusteeship, assets may be distributed in accordance with the charter, constitution, or bylaws.

(b) Makes violation of subsection (a) punishable by a maximum $10,000 fine or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

Section 204:

(a) Provides that upon the written complaint of a member or subordinate union alleging violation of section 202 or 203, the secretary shall investigate and if he finds an unremedied violation, he may petition the appropriate Federal district court to enjoin and dissolve the trusteeship and for other appropriate relief.

(b) Provides for place and manner of bringing suit.

(c) This subsection provides that a trusteeship established by a labor organization (1) in conformity with the procedural requirements of its constitution and (2) authorized or ratified by the executive board of the labor organization after a hearing, shall be presumed valid for a period of 18 months. This presumption may be rebutted by clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship was not established for the purposes allowable under section 202. After the expiration of 18 months there will be a presumption that the trusteeship is invalid in any proceeding brought by the Secretary to remove the subordinate union from the trusteeship unless the labor organization can show by clear and convincing proof that the continuation of the trusteeship is necessary for a purpose allowable under section 202. If the labor organization can so show, the court may continue the trusteeship for a period not in excess of 1 additional year.

Section 205: Requires a report within 3 years by the Secretary on operation of title II.

Section 206: Makes clear that Federal suits under title II are possible only upon suit initiated by the Secretary. But all other rights and remedies at law or in equity are specially preserved, with the limitation that when the Secretary does file a complaint the proceeding is to be exclusive and the result res judicata.

TITLE III—ELECTIONS

Section 301:

(a) Provides that national and international officers named in a union constitution as well as the members of its executive board or similar governing body shall be elected at least every 4 years by a secret ballot of the membership of the union or by a vote of a convention composed of delegates chosen by secret ballot in accordance with the union's constitution and bylaws.

(b) This subsection requires that the officers named in a local union's constitution as well as the members of its executive board or other similar governing body be elected at least every 3 years by a secret ballot among its members in good standing and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws.

(c) Requires that members of a labor organization be given an opportunity to nominate and vote without coercion or restraint in selecting officers and delegates to a convention. Fifteen days notice of date and time of any election is to be mailed to members unless the election is to be held at a regular time specified by the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization on file with the Secretary. Every member shall have one vote, and a member whose dues are checked off under a bargaining agreement is not to be disqualified for dues default. Ballots and election records are to be preserved for one year by appropriate officials of the union. The union constitution and bylaws are to govern the election to extent not inconsistent with the act.

(d) Provides that in a convention where delegates are to choose officers, the union constitution and bylaws are to govern and delegate credentials, minutes, and convention records pertaining to the election of officers are to be preserved for one year after the election.

(e) Provides that neither union nor employer funds are to be used to promote candidates in union elections subject to this title. Union funds may be used for ordinary expenses in connection with elections—for notices to members, statements to members of issues to be voted on, and other expenses incident to the conduct of an election.

(f) and (g) Provide that if the Secretary upon application of a member of a local union finds that the union's constitution does not provide for the removal of an officer guilty of serious misconduct, the officer may be removed by a secret ballot vote of the members in an election held for that purpose. The Secretary is granted authority to promulgate rules and regulations prescribing standards for carrying out subsection (f).

Section 302: Provides procedures by which a member of a labor organization who (1) has exhausted the remedies available under the constitution and bylaws of his union and of any parent body, or (2) has invoked available remedies without obtaining a final decision within 4 calendar months, may initiate proceedings through the Secretary to have the election declared invalid and a new election conducted, pursuant to a Federal district court order, under the direction of the Secretary. Challenged elections would be presumed valid pending a final decision, and in the interim the affairs of the union are to be conducted by the officers elected or in such other manner as the constitution and bylaws provide. Court actions to enforce the election provisions of title III would be brought by the Secretary if, after investigation he finds probable cause to believe title III has been violated. The Secretary would be required to bring such action within 60 days after a complaint of violation has been filed with him. In any such action the court's decision would have to be based upon a preponderance of the evidence after a trial upon the merits. An order directing an election, dismissing a complaint, or designating the elected officers of a labor organization under this section would be appealable in the same manner as the final judgment in a civil action. However, an order directing an election could not be delayed by an appeal. If the court voids an election after a trial it is empowered by this section to preserve the property and assets of the labor organization pending the selection of new officers.

Section 303: Makes exclusive the election remedies provided by the bill and provides no labor organization shall be required to hold elections more frequently or by different procedures than those specified in the bill.

Section 304: The election provisions are to become effective—

(1) within 90 days for unions whose constitutions and bylaws can be modified to conform by its officers or interim governing bodies such as a general executive board or council; or

(2) where appropriate modification can be made only by convention, by the next convention of the labor organization or within 2 years after enactment, whichever is sooner.

Section 305:

(a) Bars persons convicted of committing certain specified crimes, e.g., robbery, bribery, extortion, from holding responsible union office. This section also establishes a procedure whereby the Secretary, after notifying local law enforcement officers and after a hearing, may make a determination that despite conviction of the crimes enumerated by the section, the service of such a person as a union officer would not defeat the purposes of the act.

(b) Bars any person from holding union office who fails after notice, to file reports required by title I and who after a hearing on a written record the Secretary finds in violation, or who has been convicted of a violation of the title; such bar to be effective for 5 years from the date of such determination or conviction. No union or union officer shall knowingly and willfully permit any person to assume or hold office in violation of this subsection.

(c) Violations of section 305 are punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

(d) Specifies that for purposes of section 305 a person who has been convicted of violating title I is to be deemed to have been convicted and under disability of conviction from the date of the judgment of the trial court or the date of the final sustaining of the judgment on appeal, whichever is later.

TITLE IV—CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES—ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Section 401:

(a) Declares that it is in the national interest that labor organizations and nationwide and industrywide associations of employers engaged in industries affecting commerce should voluntarily adopt or subscribe to codes of ethical practices obligating such labor organizations or employers, as the case may be, to adhere to principles and procedures of conduct which will effectively eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities in the administration of their affairs, in the use and expenditure of their funds and in their relations with each other.

Declares the codes of ethical practices applicable to national and international labor organizations should contain provisions which will safeguard the democratic rights and privileges of members and which will eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities on the part of labor organizations or their subordinate locals or any officer or agent thereof. Codes of ethical practices applicable to both labor organizations and employers should contain methods and procedures to assure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions of such codes.

Provides that codes of ethical practices should contain appropriate provisions for publication of the provisions of the codes so that employers and employees in the industries affected and the public will be fully apprised as to the provisions of the codes.

(b) Provides that codes of ethical practices shall not authorize or sanction any conduct on the part of any labor organization or employer or any officer, agent, or representative thereof which violates any Federal, State, or local law.

Section 402:

(a), (b), and (c) Establishes an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices to advise the Secretary on the administration of this act, including the provisions of title I, reporting and disclosure; title II, trusteeships; and title III, union elections; as well as title IV.

Section 403: Provides that not later than 3 years from the date of enactment of the bill the Secretary shall report to Congress on the progress achieved by labor organizations and employers engaged in industries affecting commerce in the elimination of improper activities in the administration of their affairs and the use and expenditure of their funds with particular reference to the significance of the voluntary adoption of self-policing codes of ethical practices in achieving such results.

TITLE V—DEFINITIONS AND MISCELLANOUS

Section 501: Contains definitions of various terms in the bill.

Section 502: Specifies that titles I, II, III, IV, and V are not to be construed as affecting in any way rights or obligations under the National Labor Relations Act or the Railway Labor Act.

Section 503: Specifies that for purposes of investigations provided under the bill, the Secretary is to have subpena power, as provided in sections 9 and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

TITLE VI—AMENDMENTS TO THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947, AS AMENDED

Section 601: Directs the National Labor Relations Board to assert the full jurisdiction given it under the National Labor Relations Act. Provides that the Board may cede jurisdiction over cases in certain industries to State agencies unless the State statute governing the disposition of such cases is inconsistent with the Federal law.

Section 602:

(a) Makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to conduct "shakedown" picketing, i.e., picketing with no legitimate purpose but which is to force an employer to "buy off" the union official involved.

(b) Makes applicable the "mandatory injunction" provision of the act (sec. 10(1)), to such picketing so as to provide a speedy remedy for such abuses.

Section 603:

(a) Permits an employer primarily engaged in the building and construction industry to enter into agreements with labor organizations despite the fact that the union's majority status has not been established under section 9 of the Act. The section also permits the union shop provisions of such a contract to take effect within 7 days of hiring. No other change is made in union security limitations now in the law. The agreements could also provide for: Employer notification to the union of job openings and opportunity for the union to refer qualified applicants for the openings. Agreements for apprenticeship qualifications, experience, industry, or geographical seniority would be permissible to meet the peculiar needs of the industry. It is specifically provided that a contract permitted by this section would not be a bar to a representation or decertification election if without the authorization of the section it would not be a bar to such an election.

(b) This subsection specifically provides that the union security provisions of agreements permitted by (a) are subject to the limitations of State and Territorial law just as all collective agreements under section 8(a)(3) are limited by the provisions of section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 604: Amends the National Labor Relations Act to provide that economic strikers shall not be deprived of their right to vote in representation elections even though they have been replaced in the course of a lawful strike.

Section 605: Amends the definition of the term "supervisor" contained in present law so as to clarify that only those whose principal duties are to recall, discharge, promote, etc., are to be classed as supervisors for purposes of the law.

Section 606: Separability clause.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, and that the bill lie on the table for 1 day in order that names of Senators other than those who have already joined who may desire to join as cosponsors, may be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the table for 1 day, and will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The bill (S. 505) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959."

DECLARATION OF FINDINGS, PURPOSES, AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that, in the public interest, it continues to be the responsibility of the Federal Government to protect employees' rights to organize, choose their own representatives, bargain collectively, and otherwise engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection; that the relations between employers and labor organizations and the millions of workers they represent have a substantial impact on the commerce of the Nation; and that in order to accomplish the objective of a free flow of commerce it is essential that labor organizations, employers, and their officials adhere to the highest standards of responsibility and ethical conduct in administering the affairs of their organization, particularly as they affect labor management relations.

(b) The Congress further finds, from recent investigations in the labor and management fields, that there have been a number of instances of breach of trust, corruption, disregard of the rights of individual employees and other failures to observe high standards of responsibility and ethical conduct which require further and supplementary legislation that will afford necessary protection of the rights and interests of employees and the public generally as they relate to the activities of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives.

The Congress, therefore, further finds and declares that the enactment of this Act is necessary to eliminate or prevent improper practices on the part of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives which distort and defeat the policies of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended, and the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and have the tendency or necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (1) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (2) occurring in the current of commerce; (3) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods into or from the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (4) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing into or from the channels of commerce.

(c) It is declared to be the policy of the United States to advance the objectives and protect the national interests referred to in subsection (a), and correct the evils referred to in subsection (b) by (1) requiring labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives engaged in industries affecting commerce to file with the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") certain reports and information concerning their administrative practices and financial transactions, which shall be public information, (2) regulating the appointment of trustees or receivers by labor organizations engaged in industries affecting commerce to administer the affairs of subordinate labor organizations, (3) providing that labor organizations engaged in industries affecting commerce shall elect their officers periodically either directly by secret ballot or through delegates chosen by secret ballot, (4) encouraging voluntary action by labor organizations and employers engaged in industries affecting commerce, through the adoption of codes of ethical practices and suitable implementation and publication thereof, to eliminate and prevent improper activities in the administration of their affairs, their financial transactions, and their relations with each other, and (5) providing procedures for preventing acts and omissions of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives, which are detrimental to the rights and interests of individual employees and the public, and imposing criminal penalties for willful violations of provisions of this Act.

(e) Subsections (f) and (g) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 102. (a) Every officer of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce and every employee of such a labor organization, (other than a clerical employee, as defined by the Secretary), who received wages, salary, expenses or other allowances in excess of $5,000 during the preceding fiscal year from labor organizations, shall file with the Secretary a signed report listing and describing for the preceding fiscal year—

(6) any payment received directly or indirectly from any employer or any person who acts as a labor relations expert, advisor, or consultant to an employer pursuant to any agreement or arrangement by which the officer or employee is to influence or affect employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and the Railway Labor Act, as amended.

(b) The provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), and (5) of subsection (a) shall not apply to securities traded on a securities exchange registered as a national securities exchange under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 or to shares in an investment company registered under the Investment Company Act of 1940, or to securities of a public utility holding company registered under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, or to any income derived therefrom.

(c) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to require any officer or employee of a labor organization to file a report under subsection (a) unless he or his spouse or minor child holds an interest, has received income or a loan or has engaged in a transaction described therein.

SEC. 103. (a) Every employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall file with the Secretary a report, signed by its President and Treasurer or corresponding principal officers, listing and describing for the preceding fiscal year—

(3) any payment or loan, direct or indirect, of any money or other thing of value, or any promise or agreement therefor, to any labor organization or any officer or employee of any labor organization except (i) payments pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement the terms of which have been fully disclosed to the employees in the bargaining unit, (ii) compensation paid to an officer or employee of a labor organization for, or by reason of, his services as an employee of such employer, and (iii) payments or loans made by any national or State bank, credit union, insurance company, savings and loan association, or other credit institution.

SEC. 104. (a) The contents of the reports and documents filed with the Secretary pursuant to sections 101, 102, and 103 shall be public information, and the Secretary may publish any information and data concerning labor organizations, employers and labor relations consultants which he obtains pursuant to the provisions of this title. The Secretary may use the information and data for statistical and research purposes, and compile and publish such studies, analyses, reports, and surveys based thereon as he may deem appropriate.

(b) The Secretary shall by regulation make reasonable provision for the inspection and examination, on the request of any person of the information and data contained in any report or other document filed with him pursuant to section 101, 102, or 103.

(c) The Secretary may by regulation provide for the furnishing by the Department of Labor of copies of reports or other documents filed with the Secretary pursuant to this title, upon payment of a charge based upon the cost of the service: Provided, That the Secretary shall make available without payment of a charge, or require any labor organization or employer to furnish, to such State agency as is designated by law or by the Governor of the State in which such labor organization or such employer has its principal place of business or headquarters, upon request of the Governor of such State, copies of any reports and documents filed by such labor organization or by such employer with the Secretary pursuant to section 101 or 103, or of information and data contained therein. Provided further, That no person shall be required by reason of any law of any State to furnish to any officer or agency of such State any information included in a report filed by such person with the Secretary pursuant to the provisions of this title, if a copy of such report, or of the portion thereof containing such information, is furnished to such officer or agency. (a) Reports required to be filed under sections 101, 102, and 103 of this title shall be filed within ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act, or within sixty days after the date when any person is first required to file any such report pursuant to such sections, whichever is the later date, and annually thereafter as the Secretary shall prescribe.

(b) The Secretary shall have authority to issue, amend, and rescind rules and regulations prescribing the form, content, and publication of reports required to be filed under this Act and such other reasonable rules and regulations (including rules prescribing reports concerning building funds, trusts, or enterprises financed by a labor organization) as he may find necessary to prevent the circumvention or evasion of such reporting requirements. In exercising his power under this section the Secretary shall prescribe by general rule simplified forms of report for labor organizations or employers for whom he finds that a detailed report would be unduly burdensome: Provided, that the Secretary may revoke such provision for simplified forms of any labor organization or employer if he determines, after such investigation as he deems proper, that the purposes of this section would be served thereby.

(c) The Secretary shall have the power and is directed, when he has probable cause to believe that any person or labor organization has violated any provision of this title, to make an investigation and in connection therewith he may enter such places and inspect such records and accounts as may be necessary to enable him to determine the facts relative thereto. If any person shall fail or refuse to file a report required by this title, the Secretary shall make a full investigation and report to the members of the labor organization concerning the facts required to be shown in the report and concerning the reasons for such failure or refusal to file. The Secretary is authorized in his discretion to publish information concerning any such violations and to study such facts, conditions, practices, or matters, and publish such reports, as he may deem necessary or proper to aid in the enforcement of the provisions referred to or in the prescribing of rules and regulations thereunder.

SEC. 107. (a) No labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall make directly or indirectly any loan or loans in excess of $1,500 to any officer or employee of such organization.

(b) No employer engaged in an industry, business or activity affecting commerce shall make directly or indirectly any loan or loans to any officer or employee of a labor organization representing or actively seeking to represent his employees.

SEC. 108. (a) Any person who willfully violates or fails to comply with any provision of this title or the rules or regulations issued by the Secretary thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(b) Any person who makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, knowing it to be false, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any document, report or other information required under the provisions of this title or the rules or regulations issued thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(c) Any person who willfully destroys any books, records, reports, or statements required to be kept by any provision of this title shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

(d) Each individual required to sign reports under sections 101 and 103 shall be personally responsible for the filing of such reports and for any statement contained therein.

SEC. 109. (a) Any person who embezzles, steals, or unlawfully and willfully abstracts or converts to his own use or the use of another any of the moneys, funds, securities, property, or other assets of an organization which is exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 of which he is an officer or by whom he is employed directly or indirectly shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

(b) When any officer or employee of any labor organization has been convicted of embezzling, stealing, or unlawfully and willfully abstracting or converting to his own use or the use of another any money or property of the labor organization in violation of the provisions of subsection (a), and the labor organization or its governing board or officers refuse or fail to sue to recover such money or property or the value of the same after being requested to do so by any member of the labor organization, any member of the labor organization may sue the offending officer or employee in any district court of the United States or in any State court of competent jurisdiction to recover such money or property or the value thereof for the benefit of the labor organization. No such proceeding shall be brought except upon leave of the court obtained upon verified application and for good cause shown, which application may be made ex parte. The trial judge may allot a reasonable part of the recovery in any action under this subsection to pay the fees of counsel prosecuting the suit at the instance of the member of the labor organization and to compensate such member for any expenses necessarily paid or incurred by him in connection with the litigation.

SEC. 110. (a) Chapter 101 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding a new section as follows:

"§ 2077. (a) False entry and destruction of records of labor organizations

(b) The analysis preceding chapter 101 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

The Secretary may authorize the performance by the Commissioner of Labor Reports of any functions of the Secretary under this act.

TITLE II—TRUSTEESHIPS

SEC. 201. (a) Every national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce which has or assumes trusteeship over any subordinate organization shall file with the Secretary within 30 days after the date of the enactment of this act or the imposition of any such trusteeship and, semiannually thereafter, a report, signed by its president and secretary or corresponding principal officers, containing the following information: (A) the name and address of the subordinate organization; (B) the date of establishing the trusteeship; (C) a detailed statement of the reason or reasons for establishing or continuing the trusteeship; (D) the nature and extent of participation by the membership of the subordinate organization in the selection of delegates to represent such organization in regular or special conventions or other policy-determining bodies and in the election of officers of such national or international labor organization.

(b) The provisions of sections 104, 105, and subsections (c) and (d) of section 106 of title I shall be applicable to reports filed under this title.

(c) Any person who willfully violates or fails to comply with any provision of this section or the rules or regulations issued thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(d) Any person who makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, knowing it to be false, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any report required under the provisions of this section or the rules and regulations issued thereunder, or willfully conceals or destroys any documents or records upon which such report is based, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(e) Each individual required to sign a report under this section shall be personally responsible for the filing of such report and for any statement contained therein.

(f) Every labor organization required to submit a report under this title shall make available the information required to be contained in such report to all of its members in any subordinate organization involved in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe.

SEC. 202. Trusteeships shall be established and administered by a national or international labor organization over a subordinate body only in accordance with the constitution of such organization and for the purpose of correcting corruption or financial malpractice, assuring the performance of collective bargaining agreements or other duties of a bargaining representative, restoring democratic procedures, or otherwise carrying out the legitimate objects of such labor organization.

SEC. 203. (a) During any period when a subordinate body of a labor organization is in trusteeship, it shall be unlawful (1) to count the vote of delegates from such body in any convention or election of officers of the labor organization unless the delegates have been chosen by secret ballot in an election in which all the members in good standing of such subordinate body were eligible to participate or (2) to transfer to such organization any current receipts or other funds of the subordinate body except the normal per capita tax and assessments payable by subordinate bodies not in trusteeship: Provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the distribution of the assets of a labor organization in accordance with its charter or constitution and bylaws upon the bona fide dissolution thereof.

(b) Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year or both.

SEC. 204. (a) Upon the written complaint of any member or subordinate body of a labor organization alleging that such organization has violated the provisions of section 202 or 203, the Secretary shall investigate the complaint and if the Secretary finds probable cause to believe that such violation has occurred and has not been remedied he shall, without disclosing the identity of the complainant, bring a civil action in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the labor organization to prevent and restrain such violation and for such other relief as may be appropriate.

(b) For the purpose of actions under this section district courts of the United States shall be deemed to have jurisdiction of a labor organization (1) in the district in which such organization maintains its principal office, or (2) in any district in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in conducting the affairs of the trusteeship. Such organization may be sued as an entity. The service of summons, subpena, or other legal process of any court of the United States upon an officer or agent of a labor organization in his capacity as such, shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

(c) In any proceeding pursuant to this section a trusteeship established by a labor organization in conformity with the procedural requirements of its constitution and bylaws and authorized or ratified by the executive board or similar governing body of the labor organization after a fair hearing shall be presumed valid for a period of eighteen months from the date of its establishment and shall not be subject to attack during such period except upon clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship was not established in good faith for a purpose allowable under section 202. After the expiration of eighteen months the trusteeship shall be presumed invalid in any such proceeding and its discontinuance shall be decreed unless the labor organization shall show by clear and convincing proof that the continuation of the trusteeship is necessary for a purpose allowable under section 202. In the latter event the court may dismiss the complaint, enter a decree approving the continuation of the trusteeship for such period as it deems appropriate, but not longer than one additional year or retain jurisdiction of the cause.

SEC. 205. The Secretary shall submit to the Congress at the expiration of three years from the date of enactment of this Act a report upon the operation of this title.

SEC. 206. Nothing contained in this title shall be deemed to authorize any suit in any court of the United States except upon complaint of the Secretary. The rights and remedies provided by this title shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies at law or in equity: Provided, That upon the filing of a complaint by the Secretary the jurisdiction of the district court over such trusteeship shall be exclusive and the final judgment shall be res judicata.

SEC. 301. (a) Every national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, except a federation of national or international labor organizations, shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body not less often than once every four years either by secret ballot among the members in good standing or at a convention of delegates chosen by secret ballot and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws.

(b) Every local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body not less often than once every three years by secret ballot among the members in good standing and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws.

(c) In any election required by this section to be held by secret ballot a reasonable opportunity shall be given for the nomination of candidates, and the members in good standing shall be permitted to vote without coercion and restraint. Not less than fifteen days prior to the election there shall be mailed to each member at his last known home address a notice of the time and place of the election, unless the election is held at the regular time specified in the constitution and bylaws of such organization on file with the Secretary of Labor. Each member in good standing shall be entitled to one vote. No member whose dues have been withheld by his employer for payment to such organization pursuant to his voluntary authorization provided for in a collective bargaining agreement shall be declared ineligible to vote or be a candidate for office in such organization by reason of alleged delay or default in the payment of dues. The election officials designated in the constitution and bylaws or the secretary, if no other official is designated, shall preserve for one year the ballots and all other records pertaining to the election. The election shall be conducted in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of such organization insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title.

(d) When officers are chosen by a convention of delegates elected by secret ballot, the convention shall be conducted in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title. The officials designated in the constitution and bylaws or the secretary, if no other is designated, shall preserve for one year the credentials of the delegates and all minutes and other records of the convention pertaining to the election of officers.

(e) No moneys received by any labor organization by way of dues, assessment, or similar levy, and no moneys of an employer shall be contributed or applied to promote the candidacy of any person in an election subject to the provisions of this title. Such moneys of a labor organization may be utilized for notices, factual statements of issues, and other expenses necessary for the holding of an election.

(f) If the Secretary, upon application of any member of a local labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, finds that the constitution and bylaws of such labor organization do not provide an adequate procedure for the removal of an elected officer guilty of serious misconduct, such officer may be removed for cause shown and after notice and hearing by the members in good standing voting in a secret ballot conducted by the officers of such labor organization in accordance with its constitution and bylaws insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this title.

(g) The Secretary shall promulgate rules and regulations prescribing minimum standards for carrying out the provisions of subsection (f).

SEC. 302. (a) A member of a labor organization—

(1) who has exhausted the remedies available under the constitution and bylaws of such organization and of any parent body, or

(2) who has invoked such available remedies without obtaining a final decision within four calendar months after their invocation, may file a complaint with the Secretary of Labor within one calendar month thereafter alleging the violation of any provision of section 301 (including violation of the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization.) The challenged election shall be presumed valid pending a final decision thereon (as hereinafter provided) and in the interim the affairs of the organization shall be conducted by the officers elected or in such other manner as its constitution and bylaws may provide.

(b) The Secretary shall investigate such complaint and if he finds probable cause to believe that a violation of this Act has occurred and has not been remedied, he shall, within sixty days after the filing of such complaint bring a civil action against the labor organization as an entity in the district court of the United States in which such labor organization maintains its principal office to set aside the invalid election, if any, and to direct the conduct of an election under the supervision of the Secretary and in accordance with the provisions of this title and such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. The service of summon, subpena or other legal process of a court of the United States upon an officer or agent of a labor organization in his capacity as such shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

(c) If upon a preponderance of the evidence after a trial upon the merits the court finds—

(1) that an election has not been held within the time prescribed by section 301, or

(2) that the violation of section 301 affected the outcome of an election, the court shall declare the election, if any, to be void and direct the conduct of a new election under supervision of the Secretary and, so far as lawful and practicable, in conformity with the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization. The Secretary shall promptly certify to the court the names of the persons elected and the court shall thereupon enter a decree declaring such persons to be the officers of the labor organization.

(d) An order directing an election, dismissing a complaint or designating elected officers of a labor organization shall be appealable in the same manner as the final judgment in a civil action but an order directing an election shall not be stayed pending appeal.

(e) If the court declares an election to be void after a trial on the merits, it shall have power to take appropriate steps to preserve and safeguard the assets of the organization pending the selection of officers.

SEC. 303. The duties imposed and the rights and remedies provided by this title shall be exclusive, and no labor organization subject to the provisions of this title shall be required to conduct elections of officers with greater frequency or in a different form or manner than is required by this title.

SEC. 304. The provisions of this title shall become applicable—

(1) ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act in the case of a labor organization whose constitution and bylaws can lawfully be modified or amended by action of its constitutional officers or governing body, or

(2) where such modification can only be made by a constitutional convention of the labor organization, not later than the next constitutional convention of such labor organization after the date of enactment of this Act, or two years after such date, whichever is sooner.

SEC. 305. (a) No person who has been convicted of robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, violation of narcotics laws, or conspiracy to commit any of such crimes shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager, paid organizer or other paid officer or employee of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, unless the Secretary determines that such person's services as an officer, director, trustee, member of an executive board or similar governing body, business agent, manager or paid organizer of such organization would not be contrary to the purposes of this Act. Prior to making such a determination the Secretary shall hold an administrative hearing and shall give notice of such proceeding by certified mail to the State, county and Federal prosecuting officials in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which such person was convicted and also in the jurisdiction in which he proposes to serve a labor organization. The Secretary's determination in any such proceeding shall be final.

(b) No person, who after notice by the Secretary, shall have failed to file any information required by title I or title II, and who, after a hearing on a written record, is determined by the Secretary to have violated title I or title II, and no person who has been convicted of any violation of title I or title II shall serve as an officer, director, trustee, member of any executive board or similar governing body, business agent, international representative, manager, paid organizer or other paid officer or employee at compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum of a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce for a period of five years after such determination by the Secretary or such conviction. No labor organization or officer thereof shall knowingly and willfully permit any person to assume or hold any office or paid position in violation of this subsection.

(c) Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(d) For the purposes of this section any person who has been convicted of a violation of title I or title II shall be deemed to have been "convicted" and under the disability of "conviction" from the date of the judgment of the trial court or the date of the final sustaining of such judgment on appeal, whichever is the later event.

TITLE IV—CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES

SEC. 401. (a) The Congress hereby declares that it is in the national interest that—

(1) national and international labor organizations and nationwide and industry-wide associations of employers engaged in industries affecting commerce shall voluntarily adopt or subscribe to codes of ethical practices obligating such labor organizations or employers, as the case may be, to adhere to principles and procedures which, with due regard to their traditions and background and their customary forms and procedures, will effectively eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities in the administration of their affairs, in the use and expenditure of their funds, and in their relations with each other;

(2) codes of ethical practices for the administration of the affairs and the use and expenditures of the funds of a national or international labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall contain provisions to safeguard the democratic rights and privileges of members and to eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities on the part of labor organizations or their subordinate bodies or organizations, or any officer or representative thereof, and measures and procedures to assure effective implementation and enforcement of such provisions;

(3) codes of ethical practices for the conduct of the business and the use and expenditure of funds of an employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall contain provisions to promote harmonious relationships between such employer and labor organizations which represent or seek to represent such employer's employees and to eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities by the employed, or any officer or representative thereof in derogation of the rights of employees under section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and measures and procedures to assure effective implementation and enforcement of said provisions; and

(4) codes of ethical practices shall contain appropriate provisions for the publishing of the provisions thereof to employers and employees in the industry affected and to the public.

(b) Codes of ethical practices shall not authorize or sanction any conduct on the part of labor organizations or employers, or officers or representatives thereof, which violates any Federal, State, or local law.

SEC. 402. (a) There is hereby established an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices (hereinafter referred to as the "Committee") to advise the Secretary in the administration of this Act.

(b) The Committee shall be composed of fifteen members appointed by the Secretary, of whom five shall be chosen from a panel nominated by bona fide labor organizations national or international in scope, five shall be chosen from a panel nominated by employer associations industrywide or national in scope, and five shall represent the public. Three members shall be appointed for a term of one year, three members for a term of two years, three members for a term of three years, three members for a term of four years, and three members for a term of five years, and thereafter appointment shall be for a term of five years, except that members appointed to fill vacancies occurring prior to the expiration of the terms of their predecessors shall be appointed only for the remainder of such terms. The terms of office of not more than one member representing labor organizations, one member representing employer associations, and one member representing the public shall terminate in any one year. The Committee shall meet at the request of the Secretary, but in any case not less frequently than four times each year, and whenever at least one-third of the members request a meeting. The members of the Committee shall receive compensation while attending meetings and performing work of the Committee at the rate of $50 a day, and shall receive necessary travel and other expenses incurred in connection with the work of the Committee.

(c) The Secretary shall provide such data and information, clerical assistance and other services and facilities as may be necessary for the Committee.

SEC. 403. The Secretary shall report to Congress not later than three years from the date of enactment of this Act on the progress achieved by labor organizations and employers in the elimination, through the voluntary adoption of self-policing codes of ethical practices, of improper activities in the administration of their affairs and the use and expenditure of their funds and shall include in such report such recommendations as he deems appropriate, based upon the experience of labor organizations and employers in adopting and implementing codes of ethical practices, pursuant to this title. The Secretary is authorized to file interim reports on these matters as part of his annual reports to Congress, pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of this Act entitled "An Act to create a Department of Labor", approved March 4, 1913 (5 U.S.C. 620).

"(c) The National Labor Relations Board shall assert jurisdiction over all labor disputes arising under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended: Provided, That the Board is empowered by agreement with any agency of any State or Territory to cede to such agency jurisdiction over any cases in any industry (other than mining, manufacturing, communications, and transportation except where predominantly local in character) even though such cases or kinds of cases may involve labor disputes affecting commerce, unless the provision of the State or Territorial statute applicable to the determination of such cases or kinds of cases by such agency is inconsistent with the corresponding provision of this Act or has received a construction inconsistent therewith."

(b) Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by repealing the proviso thereto.

SEC. 602. (a) Section 8(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6), and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and adding a new paragraph as follows:

"(7) to carry on picketing on or about the premises of any employer for the purpose of, or as part of any conspiracy or in furtherance of any plan or purpose for, the personal profit or enrichment of any individual by taking or obtaining any money or other thing of value from such employer against his will or with his consent."

(b) Section 10(l) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting after "paragraph (4)(A), (B), or (C)" the words "or paragraph 7".

REGULATION OF MANUFACTURE AND DISTRIBUTION OF HABIT FORMING BARBITURATE AND AMPHETAMINE DRUGS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, one of the more important functions of the Federal Government is to protect the American people from the harm which results from the use and transportation of dangerous drugs. As author of the original law controlling the use and transportation of marihuana, I am well aware that cities, counties, and States find it extremely difficult to exercise control over dangerous narcotics unless local laws are bolstered and bulwarked by Federal law. While serving as criminal prosecutor in St. Louis, I saw the usefulness of Federal laws when dealing with narcotic cases. In this field, the Federal Government has served the Nation well. It is my belief, however, that more work remains to be done.

The Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency, of which I have the honor to be chairman, has become increasingly concerned over the growing use of two drugs which are being utilized—mainly by juveniles and our younger citizens—to produce mental effects harmful to the individual and harmful to the society in which the individual lives. I refer to the drugs known as the amphetamines and the barbiturates.

Amphetamines and barbiturates are not classified as narcotics. They have many legitimate and beneficial medical uses. They are, however, being used for narcotic purposes; and, when used in this way, they produce narcotic effects. It might be interesting to the distinguished occupant of the chair and to my other colleagues to know just how these drugs are obtained and used—or, as I should say, misused. To make this information available, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a newspaper story from the Kansas City Star. The story deals with amphetamines, and is headlined, "Lack Controls on Thrill Drug."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LACK CONTROLS ON THRILL DRUG—MISUSE OF AMPHETAMINE IS INCREASING IN THIS AREA, OFFICIALS ASSERT—CAN BE CAUSE OF CRIME—UNITED STATES CAN'T ACT AND LOCAL OFFICIALS NEED MANPOWER TO STOP SALES

(By Harry Jones, Jr.)

Concern is mounting among city, State, and Federal authorities over the growing misuse of the stimulating drug called amphetamine. Viewed as a definite crime factor, it has become particularly serious in Kansas City the last 2 years.

Amphetamine, as it is extracted in large quantity from some nasal inhalers sold illegally here without prescription, is being used widely as a "thrill drug."

CAN LEAD TO CRIME

It causes much the same reaction in its users as narcotics, but does not have as harmful an effect on the physical condition. It tends to build up the nerve of its users to help them commit crimes they otherwise might not attempt.

Both Federal and State food and drug authorities say the problem is greater in Kansas City than in any other community in Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, or Nebraska.

Users in the Kansas City area are purchasing a certain amphetamine preparation by name, but various types are available. Amphetamine is the basic ingredient in benzedrine preparations widely used as stimulants.

Unlike the narcotics traffic here, which has been restricted mainly to the Negro population, nearly all of the amphetamine users are white, according to Lt. John Flavin, head of the police narcotics bureau.

"There are about 200 known users in the city," he said, "and that means there probably are at least 200 more we don't know about.

"The men range in age from about 18 to 40, with the bulk in their twenties. The women are mainly between 14 to 25. And they string from Ward Parkway to Missouri Avenue, with most of them south of 39th Street. They are even in some of the city's best high schools.

"It's worse than heroin in some ways, because they inject so much of it into their veins. Some use it up to 25 times a day."

Ninety-five percent of the frequent users here extract the drug from a nasal inhaler, which usually retails for about 75 cents a tube, and contains 200 milligrams of amphetamine in the fabric interior of its tube. Amphetamine tablets sold legitimately at most drugstores on prescription contain only 5 or 10 milligrams of the drug.

EIGHT TYPES PRODUCED

Clifford L. Summers, director of the Missouri Bureau of Food and Drug Inspection, said he understands there are some 8 to 10 amphetamine-type inhalers manufactured in the country.

Evan Wright, director of the food and drug division of the Kansas Board of Health, last week put out an administrative order to the Kansas drug trade stating that the sale of inhalers containing amphetamine as the primary active ingredient is in violation of the State's new Dangerous Hypnotic and Stimulating Drug Act passed last year.

The Kansas City City Council passed an ordinance in September at the suggestion of the sheriff's office and police to require a prescription for the sale of such inhalers.

Flavin, however, believes misuse of the drug has not diminished since the ordinance went into effect and that it probably will grow unless State and Federal laws are strengthened. Missouri has no such act as Kansas and therefore is unable to outlaw the sale by administrative order as Kansas just did.

A LACK OF MANPOWER

Flavin said there are several druggists in the city still selling the inhalers illegally. "The narcotics bureau does not have the manpower to clamp down on these druggists effectively now," Flavin said. The Federal Narcotics Bureau lacks jurisdiction over amphetamine because the drug is not a narcotic.

Summers estimates that 15 percent of the druggists in Kansas City are selling drugs illegally without prescriptions. Flavin said the chain drugstores have quit handling the amphetamine type of inhalers.

The city counselor's office here reports several arrests have been made on the new ordinance, but all but two defendants were released before going to municipal court because of lack of sufficient evidence. One of these was released in court for the same reason. The other, Gary Arthur Hamilton, 22 years old, 3426 Flora Avenue, received a 60-day sentence to the municipal farm.

Flavin said most of the amphetamine users known to police congregate in taverns, drugstores, and drive-ins in the vicinity of Linwood and Troost, 47th and Prospect, 31st and Woodland, and 10th and Pennsylvania, in some taverns and motels in southern Jackson County and in some taverns in Johnson and Wyandotte Counties that sell 3.2 beer to the younger set.

TEN ARRESTED PER WEEK

At least 10 users are taken into police headquarters each week for one crime or another, Flavin said.

"Medical opinion differs as to whether amphetamine is habit forming," Sam D. Fine, chief of the Kansas City district of the Federal Food and Drug Administration, said. "It isn't habit forming like narcotics are, but once the users have experienced the effects, they want to reexperience it."

Fine stressed that the drug has legitimate medical uses and can do great harm only when misused. It does not create energy in the body, but whatever is stored up is released by hiding the feeling of tiredness and the need of sleep.

When improperly used as a stimulant, it tends to create reckless behavior and may be a cause in connection with traffic accidents, wild parties, assaults, burglaries, loss of morals, and health and delinquency.

Most users here inject the amphetamine into their veins. It can be taken orally or chewed, but the stimulus is not as great.

Death has been caused by the misuse of the drug. A 21-year-old Galena, Kans., woman died last year from the effect of chewing the fabric containing amphetamine. She became violently ill in a tavern shortly after chewing it and died 6 days later in a hospital.

The U.S. official, Fine, who knows of the problem on a nationwide scale, has indicated concern over the drug's misuse both by those who take it from inhalers for thrills and truckdrivers who use bootlegged tablets to keep awake on the road. Some users call them "bennies," "nebbies" or "bizz" pills. Truckdrivers call them "copilots."

MISUSE INCREASING

"There's an increasing number of reports of the misuse of amphetamine in this area," Fine said. "We keep sending reports to Washington saying, 'Here's more and more evidence of abuse.' There may be some better controls coming.

"Right now the stuff can be sold over the counter as far as Federal laws are concerned, so we can't do anything about it unless interstate transportation is involved. There are lots of complaints in this district, but it is also heavy in Tulsa and Oklahoma City."

Carl Austin Hall, executed in the murder of 6-year-old Bobby Greenlease, used amphetamine to stimulate himself to kidnap and slay the boy, he told a Federal food and drug inspector.

"It has been my experience that for $20 most anyone can make buys of it," Hall told the official.

And the FBI found in the pocketbook of Mrs. Bonnie Heady, also executed for the Greenlease crime, a 100-tablet bottle of amphetamine.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the result of the misuse of these drugs is extremely dangerous. In psychological terms, the frustration point of the user is lowered, causing him to react violently against those who stand in his way. Moral values are lessened, allowing the individual user to act in a way contrary to his normal frame of mind. Police have found amphetamines and barbiturates a factor in crime, particularly juvenile crime. Teenagers often take them just before committing some criminal act, and many users admit that they would not have the nerve to commit a crime unless they took amphetamines.

Therefore, in order to protect the public health and to aid local governments in controlling the misuse of these drugs, I introduced for appropriate reference a bill regulating the manufacture, compounding, processing and distribution of amphetamine and barbiturate drugs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 535) to protect the public health by regulating the manufacture, compounding, processing, and distribution of habit forming barbiturate and amphetamine drugs, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY OF RETIRED MEMBERS OF UNIFORMED SERVICES

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators SYMINGTON, THURMOND, KUCHEL, ENGLE, CHAVEZ, NEUBERGER, and HENNINGS, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to equalize the pay of retired members of the uniformed services. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk for 24 hours for the purpose of permitting other Senators to cosponsor it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Washington.

The bill (S. 541) to equalize the pay of retired members of the uniformed services, introduced by Mr. JACKSON (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930, RELATING TO IMPORTATION OF CERTAIN TRADEMARKED ARTICLES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the bill is to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to remove restrictions on importation of certain articles by persons returning from abroad. It deals with the prohibition of the importation of certain trademarked articles without the consent of the trademark's owner. It is particularly onerous with respect to perfume and similar items. I hope very much we can have action on the bill in this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 542) to permit the importation of a trademarked article, without the consent of the owner of the trademark, when such article is for the personal use of the person importing such article, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, this represents another element in my longstanding interest in the promotion of international travel, upon which this matter bears.

I have today introduced in the Senate a bill to remove a tariff restriction which U.S. customs officials report to be a source of major annoyance to Americans returning from abroad. It would amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to permit the importation of trademarked articles without the consent of the trademark's owner when the item is for the personal use of the traveler, a gift from a serviceman abroad or is part of the personal effects of a Government employee or immigrant.

The long overdue change I am proposing would eliminate a minor provision in the present tariff laws which is a major cause of irritation and embarrassment to American travelers and considerable inconvenience for customs officers. It would remove the existing prohibition against importation of trademarked items without the written permission of the trademark's owner, permitting U.S. tourists to bring home world-famous brands of perfumes, cameras, watches, and so forth, as long as they are meant for the purchaser's own use and their value is charged against the personal exemption allowed. At the present time, U.S. residents may bring in articles duty free up to the amount of $200 if they have been outside the country for at least 48 hours, $300 if they have been gone 12 days or more, up to a maximum of $500 for any single trip extending beyond that period.

The tremendous expansion in U.S. tourist travel to foreign countries has meant that the great majority of American travelers annually avail themselves of the opportunity to purchase abroad for their own use such items as binoculars, watches, records, musical instruments, jewelry, cameras, perfumes, and various toilet articles bearing popular trade names. Most of them are unaware that there is a long, constantly changing list of such articles which they cannot bring home, even if their total cost falls within their personal exemption, unless they have obtained the written consent of the trademark owner. As a result, customs officers are forced to seize these items from the baggage of the U.S. residents returning home and withold them from the purchaser regardless of value.

There is little rhyme or reason to the present provision, for in a number of cases, trademark owners of famous perfumes limit tourists to one bottle each without written permission, while in the case of many other equally well known products, not a single item may be imported. In addition, the U.S. Tariff Commission has gone on record in regard to severe criticism leveled at this restriction and the many complaints about it filed by American travelers. The Commission also points out that customs officers are put to a considerable amount of extra work in connection with enforcing it.

Similar legislation dealing with this tariff restriction was introduced in the 85th Congress by Senator FREDERICK G. PAYNE, of Maine, of which I was cosponsor. Following its review by the Treasury Department, which declared itself in favor of the purpose of the bill, the present measure was drafted incorporating the Department's suggestions.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR URBAN RENEWAL PROJECTS UNDER TITLE I OF HOUSING ACT OF 1949

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize additional funds for urban renewal projects under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie at the desk until the close of business tomorrow for additional cosponsorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie at the desk, as requested by the Senator from New York.

The bill (S. 543) to authorize additional funds for urban renewal projects under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

VOTERS' INFORMATION ACT OF 1959

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I also introduce a bill which will be introduced in the other body by Representative DOOLEY, of New York, which proposes to stimulate increased citizens' participation in government and elections, which is called the Voters' Information Act of 1959. The bill provides for the prominent display in post offices of information concerning registrations, elections, and voters' qualifications, as well as the names and office addresses of U.S. Representatives and Senators representing the area served by the post office.

Mr. President, it is a truism that in our country, the greatest free country on earth, the proportion of the population voting is considerably less than it is in other countries having generally the same systems of government. Even in presidential election years only about two-thirds of the voters go to the polls. That compares with about 80 percent of voters going to the polls in Great Britain, France, and other countries of the same general character.

Mr. President, we have to find ways and means of stimulating voting. The measure which I am introducing today could be of some assistance in realizing this objective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 544) to provide for posting information in post offices with respect to registration and voting, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

Mr. JAVITS. I have today introduced a bill to stimulate increased citizen participation in government and elections. Called the Voters Information Act of 1959, it provides for the prominent display in post offices of information concerning registration, elections, and voter qualifications along with name and office address of the Representatives and U.S. Senators representing the areas served by the post office. This measure is being cosponsored in the House of Representatives by Representative EDWIN B. DOOLEY, of New York.

A measure of this kind to encourage eligible U.S. citizens to exercise their right to vote as set forth in the Constitution, regardless of race, creed, color or national origin, clearly deserves consideration by the Congress on a strictly nonpartisan basis. Now that the turmoil of last November's election is past, there is one result upon which we can all agree—it is not merely surprising, it is shocking that although 1958 set a record for off-year voting, less than 50 percent of those eligible to vote bothered to do so. At no off-year election have more than half the electorate cast ballots on a national average, although in New York State last year, about 54 percent voted.

In presidential years, the improvement is slight at best. In the record year of 1952, 62.7 percent of the eligible voters went to the polls, but 4 years later, the percentage participating slipped to 60.4 percent. Thus, at a time when U.S. policies as formulated and put into effect by our elective officials have an unprecedented impact on the future of our Nation and the free world, about one-third of the eligible voters in this country can elect a President.

Because our record of voter participation is generally lower than that of many other major democratic nations in the world, proposals for compulsory voting legislation similar to that enacted in countries like New Zealand, Belgium, Mexico, and Australia are gaining some support. Several of our States, including North Dakota and Massachusetts, already have such provisions on their books but they have never been enforced.

I do not believe that compulsory voting is the answer. Neither Great Britain nor Canada have statutes to compel voting, and yet they consistently report that between 7 and 8 out of every 10 qualified persons do go to their polls. At the end of the last century here in the United States 83 percent of our eligible voters took part in national elections.

The task before us now is to devise a practical method of increasing the average voter's personal knowledge about the time, place, and date of registration and elections, and make readily available to him the information on how to contact those who represent him in the House and the Senate. Possessing these facts, he will be greatly encouraged to register voluntarily his opinion on major issues by contacting his Representatives in Congress and by going to the polls at the next election. The Voters' Information Act of 1959, which I am introducing today, should be a measure of assistance in realizing those objectives.

The act provides that—

There shall be posted in a prominent place in each post office information with respect to the qualifications for registration and voting, the places, dates, and times for registration and voting at elections in the area served by such post office.

There shall likewise be posted in each post office the names and office addresses of the United States Senators from the State and Representatives in Congress from the congressional district in which such post office is situated.

APPOINTMENT OF TWO ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR DISTRICT OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, bills to provide for the appointment of two additional district judges for the district of Connecticut, and to provide for the holding of terms of the district court for the district of Connecticut at Bridgeport.

My distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] joins me in sponsorship of these measures.

Mr. President, these bills are endorsed by the Federal bench and bar of my State, and their enactment has been recommended for several years by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. They are identical to bills introduced in former years by myself and former Senator Purtell in the 84th and 85th Congresses.

The bill authorizing the appointment of two additional district judges was passed by the Senate in the 85th Congress, but action upon it was blocked in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I have been disturbed by reports that action on this needed legislation will again be delayed, until after the presidential elections of 1960.

I hope such reports are unfounded, although the refusal of the two preceding Congresses to act on judgeship bills gives them some color of substance. To play politics with the administration of justice is indefensible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of a report by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in the 85th Congress on a prior bill for two additional district judges for Connecticut be printed following these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropirately referred; and, without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. BUSH (for himself and Mr. DODD), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

S. 546. A bill to provide for the appointment of two additional judges for the district of Connecticut; and

S. 547. A bill to provide for the holding of terms of the district court for the district of Connecticut at Bridgeport.

The portion of the report presented by Mr. BUSH is as follows:

APPOINTMENT OF TWO ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES FOR THE DISTRICT OF CONNECTICUT PURPOSE

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to create two additional district judgeships for the district of Connecticut, raising the complement of judges in that district from two to four.

STATEMENT

This legislation has been recommended by the Judicial Conference of the United States. In the 84th Congress the Judicial Conference of the United States has recommended one additional district judge for the district of Connecticut, and in their subsequent meetings in September 1956 and March 1957 enlarged that recommendation to the creation of two additional district judgeships for the district of Connecticut.

The second judgeship for the district of Connecticut was created in 1927, and there has been no addition to the judgepower of that State since then. The Judicial Council of the Second Circuit has likewise recommended two additional judgeships for the district.

The former recommendation of one additional district judgeship was approved and reported favorably by the committee when it reported S. 1256 of the 84th Congress, but no action was taken on that legislation. This district has been the subject of hearings in the 84th and 85th Congresses and statistics of the caseload of the district of Connecticut amply justify the addition of the judgeships requested.

The number of civil cases commenced in the district in the last 5 years has increased greatly and for the 5-year period was almost twice what it was in the previous 5 years. Civil cases filed in the fiscal year 1956 were 120 percent greater than in 1941. The total civil cases and the private civil cases commenced, terminated, and pending at the end of each year for the last 10 years are shown in the appendix to this report.

The private civil cases commenced in the last 5 years are 2½ times the number commenced in the previous half decade and the number filed in 1956 was six times the 1941 filings. According to the report of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, this is of great importance in the assessment of the caseload, because private cases take, on the average, three times as much time of the judge as Government cases. The result of the increase has been a continuing rise in the number of pending private civil cases from 122 on June 30, 1947, to 606 on June 30, 1956, a fivefold increase. The number of total cases pending on June 30, 1956, 913, was three times the 305 cases pending 9 years previously.

The reason for the large increase in judicial business may be traced in part to the geographic location of the district. The State is a "conduit" for the flow of business and traffic between the large metropolitan and resort areas of New England and the large cities and farms which lie to the south. This brings to the district a continual stream of vehicular traffic and with it the personal-injury suits which grow out of automobile and truck accidents. The current volume of these cases per judge is more than twice the national average, 74 compared with a national average of 33 per judgeship in 1956. There is now one large modern highway which extends across the State from the New York border to the upper northeast corner and another toll superhighway is under construction which will link the cities along the coast from New York to Rhode Island.

Connecticut is the most highly industrialized State in the Nation and currently the various businesses in the State hold 10 percent of the dollar value of all defense contracts. Litigation concerning many of these contracts is now pending and more may be expected. Industry, and particularly the aircraft industry, is expanding rapidly.

As stated before, this district was the subject of extensive hearings particularly in the 85th Congress, at which evidence was submitted amply justifying the creation of these judgeships. The commitee, after a review of all of the evidence submitted and the recommendation therefor, is of the opinion that this legislation is meritorious and recommends S. 472 for the favorable consideration of the Senate.

GREAT LAKES BASIN COMPACT

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators HART, WILEY, PROXMIRE, DIRKSEN, HUMPHREY, DOUGLAS, HARTKE, CAPEHART, LAUSCHE, CLARK, MCCARTHY, and SCOTT, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to give congressional sanction to the Great Lakes Basin compact.

It has the support of the administration, Members of Congress for the States in the Great Lakes region, State governments in the region, and other organizations concerned with the development, use, and protection of the water resources of the Great Lakes.

The need in the Great Lakes region for an interstate agreement creating a joint agency such as the Great Lakes Commission has mounted rapidly with the growing importance to the States, the region, and the Nation of the water resources, presents many difficult problems requiring action at all levels of government. Their solution will only be accomplished by the cooperative efforts of Federal, State, and local governments.

Proposals that the Great Lakes States join in an interstate compact relating to the water resources of the Great Lakes have been advanced for more than a decade.

In its 1954 session, our Michigan Legislature enacted legislation authorizing our Governor to enter into a compact with the other Great Lakes States. The Michigan proposal envisioned an interstate organization, or commission, with factfinding, investigatory, and recommendatory powers which would consider problems relating to the waters and resources of the Great Lakes and it would recommend programs and policies to the respective State governments and to the Federal Government of the United States.

The Council of State Governments organized and conducted the Great Lakes States Seaway and Water Resources Conference in August 1954 and a resolution unanimously approved by the conference led to the development of the Great Lakes Basin compact.

Five States—Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin—speedily ratified the compact during legislative sessions in 1955. Pennsylvania gave its approval in 1956. This record of six ratifications within 1 year has seldom, if ever, been matched by any other interstate compact of comparable nature. The New York Legislature in 1957 unanimously approved the compact. While the Governor vetoed the bill, his objections pertained strictly to certain features of the enabling legislation and not to the compact itself.

The compact which became effective on July 1, 1955, upon ratification by four States has for its primary purpose the orderly use, development, and conservation of the water resources of the Great Lakes Basin and to insure that all the Great Lakes may derive the maximum benefit from utilization of public works. The compact will also assist in maintaining a proper balance among industrial, commercial, agricultural, water supply, residential, recreational, and other uses of the water resources of the area.

Mr. President, this bill recognizes the national and international interest in the use and development of the Great Lakes as it specifically limits the Compact to the eight Great Lakes and it excludes participation by any Canadian Province. Section 2 of the bill clearly provides that the powers or rights of the United States are in no way affected. It requires the Great Lakes Commission to cooperate with agencies of the Federal Government; and spells out certain conditions and procedures which must be followed in matters of an international nature or concern.

This bill is identical with S. 1416 which I introduced in the last session. It passed the Senate on July 28 last year but unfortunately it was caught in the legislative logjam in the House in the closing hours of the session and it was not acted upon in the House. I believe this bill will contribute much to the welfare of one of the most important regions of our country. On behalf of Michigan and her sister States on the Great Lakes, I urge favorable action on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 548) granting the consent of Congress to a Great Lakes Basin compact, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MCNAMARA (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF CODE TO PROHIBIT FRAUD IN INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE OF CERTAIN SALES ACTIVITIES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, during the 2d session of the 85th Congress, I introduced, on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and myself, Senate bill 3889, the purpose of which was to eliminate certain unscrupulous practices in the advertising of real estate and business opportunities—in particular, the so-called advance-fee racket.

The activities of the advance-fee operators came to the attention of the Senate Permanent Investigating Subcommittee early last year; and, following a preliminary investigation by our subcommittee's professional staff, Senator MCCLELLAN and I decided to introduce proposed legislation designed to control this fraudulent enterprise. Initial hearings were held on the Mundt-McClellan bill late last summer by the Permanent Investigating Subcommittee; but the results of these hearings were inconclusive from the standpoint of determining the exact type of legislation which is needed in order to eliminate the racketeers from the real estate advertising business.

Since the original introduction of this measure, considerable national publicity has been given to the insidious advance-fee racket. The publicity has included an excellent feature article publised in the Saturday Evening Post. Mr. President, the Saturday Evening Post's reporter did such a thorough job of outlining the mechanics of this racket, that I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD, for the edification of all the Members of this body. I feel certain that this national publicity has served a beneficial purpose in alerting the American public to the techniques employed by these master "con men." However, I fear that publicity alone is not sufficient to eliminate this noxious growth from our American economic garden. I am, therefore, introducing, in cosponsorship with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] a revised version of Senate bill 3889, with the earnest hope that the 86th Congress will enact effective legislation to control the illicit advance-fee advertisers.

As I stated earlier, Mr. President, our initial hearings did not sufficiently advise our committee as to the overall scope and nature of the advance-fee racket. That additional Federal statutes are necessary to eradicate these fraudulent operators would seem to be beyond dispute, based on our committee's inquiry thus far; but it is clearly evident that further hearings and study will be required in order to draft effective enforcement statutes to deal with this problem.

I introduce this bill, not as the final and all-perfect legislative formula, but merely as a vehicle to be used by our committee in continuing forward with full and comprehensive hearings on the subject of the advance-fee rackets. I shall welcome legislative recommendations from my colleagues and from interested private, public, and quasi-public bodies, such as the National Association of License Law Officials.

It is my hope that early hearings will be scheduled on this subject, and that the various Federal enforcement agencies will provide the committee with maximum advice and cooperation in the drafting of effective statutes to control and combat these racketeers, who have fleeced innocent Americans of millions of dollars. Mr. President, I recognize that under the Senate rules this bill would normally be referred to the Judiciary Committee; but due to the fact that the Permanent Investigating Subcommittee has already conducted the initial hearings, I make a special request that the bill be referred to the Committee on Government Operations, for the purpose of additional hearings and study.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Government Operations, and the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 550) to amend chapter 95 of title 18 of the United States Code to prohibit the perpetration of fraud in connection with the conduct in interstate or foreign commerce of certain sales activities, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MUNDT (for himself and Mr. MCCLELLAN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

The article presented by Mr. MUNDT is as follows:

BEWARE THE ADVANCE-FEE RACKET—THIS CON GAME CHEATED AMERICANS OUT OF $50 MILLION IN THE PAST YEAR—THE BAIT: A PROMISE TO SELL THE VICTIM'S BUSINESS OR PROPERTY AT A PROFIT—THE BITE: A REASONABLE FEE, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

(By John Kobler)

Proliferating like toadstools throughout the United States today is a noxious new species of con man, the advance-fee swindler. His sphere of operation is real estate; his prey, owners of distressed small properties and businesses, such as hotdog stands, truck farms, barbershops, and motels, from whom he mulcts sums ranging between $100 and $3,000 with fake promises of a quick sale. Many of the victims are elderly or invalid, almost all are in dire financial straits. California's assistant real estate commissioner, Donald McClure, calls it "one of the most vicious rackets we've ever had to deal with."

At first blush the advance-fee swindle appears so simple in its basic elements as to defy belief that it could entrap anybody above the I.Q. level of a moron. Yet innumerable dupes have parted with sizable amounts in the presence of their own lawyers. About 70 advance-fee outfits, some with interlocking directorships, are currently plying their wiles. In 1958 their combined loot came close to $50 million. So far no effective counterweapon has been devised.

Last May the National Association of License Law Officials assembled in Oklahoma City, full of wrath and frustration, to intensify its campaign against the swindlers. A month earlier the attorneys general of 11 Western States, Alaska and Hawaii, meeting in Portland, Oreg., pondered ways to prosecute them. None of the existing legal machinery, State or Federal, the majority agreed, was adequate. The following July the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, under acting chairman Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, of Washington, held a 2-day hearing at which officials of the Federal Trade Commission, the United States Post Office, various State realty boards, and better business bureaus testified to the scope of the racket and the immunity of the racketeers.

A veteran FTC trial attorney, John W. Brookfield, disclosed that since 1955, when his office investigated the first complaint, he had managed to obtain cease-and-desist orders against only 5 advance-fee firms—the number now stands at 6 and the FTC is investigating 30. Without exception the culprits consented to the order; then, in several instances, their associates and/or employees promptly resumed operations under a new corporative setup. From a single Chicago company, Brookfield reported, 22 others had evolved. "Certainly," commented subcommitteeman Senator KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota, "we can't sit idly by while all these weeds grow up in our economic garden."

The apparent simplicity of the scheme is deceptive. As in every successful con game, the gimmick itself is secondary to a subtle interplay of showmanship, hypnotic verbiage, misstatement, and the desperation or avarice of the victim. Let us consider first a typical advance-fee transaction as it looked to the victim.

Until recently Mrs. Mildred Antes, of Oklahoma City, ran a training school for switchboard operators. It was a faltering enterprise with only 30 students. A divorcee of 49, chronically ill, who had never been happy away from her native town of Wichita Falls, Tex., longed to sell out and go home. Her hopes soared, therefore, when the mailman delivered the following post card from National Business & Property Exchange, Inc., of Los Angeles:

"DEAR FRIEND: I am planning on visiting your area soon. Through our publication, National Buyers' Guide, we have requests from people who are interested in buying businesses and properties in your area. If you want to sell, please drop me a line right away and I will stop in to see you."

Mrs. Antes dropped a line. A week later a dark, dynamic man in his early thirties, wearing a black-and-white checked sport coat and a red sports shirt, briskly introduced himself. Mrs. Antes has forgotten his name. We will call him Will Watson. Of his electrifying spiel she recalls only the general drift. He began by asking what value she placed on her school. Mrs. Antes would have been overjoyed to accept $2,000; the school was probably unsalable at any price, but Watson assured her she could count on at lease $5,000. Why, said he, National Property had scores of customers, cash in hand, fairly panting to own just such a business. He promised that within 60 days the deal would be consummated.

Flashing a contract, a warranty of performance, and a copy of National Buyers' Guide, a thick, glossy paper monthly catalog crammed with property listings in 48 States, Watson explained the terms. For 3 percent of the anticipated net, payable in advance, the school would be listed in the next issue of the periodical, which the corporation distributed "to hundreds of leading brokers throughout the Nation who request it." Moreover, should no sale result, the entire fee would be refunded.

In her bedazzlement it never occurred to Mrs. Antes to wonder whether a classified ad in a local newspaper, costing $2 or $3, might not bring a better response than a catalog circulated thousands of miles away; whether an Oklahoman might not be a likelier prospect than, say, a New Yorker. Nor did she think to ask Watson why, if he already had a prospect in view, he didn't simply produce him without advertising at all. After perusing the contract with what she fancied was a shrewd eye, Mrs. Antes signed it and parted with $150.

No prospect ever approached her. Silence met her protests to the corporation. She has since gone into bankruptcy. Yet a belatedly thorough scrutiny of the contract and warranty showed her that National Business had perpetrated no provable fraud. It had undertaken merely to print and distribute an ad for a preagreed fee; it purported to be a publishing concern, not a real-estate brokerage. The joker lay in the clause, "This agreement contains the entire understanding between us, and no other representation or inducement has been made that is not set forth herein." Thus the corporation disclaimed responsibility for its own salesman's verbal enticements.

As Senator JACKSON summed it up, "The misrepresentations of the salesman, upon which the businessman relies, and the wording of the contract are not in the least related." Or in the words of California's Commissioner McClure, "They may be advertisers, but the victims think they're real estate brokers."

Let us now examine the racket from the inside through the eyes of a Chicagoan who was once among its most astute practitioners. Because he is today a reformed character, and because he fears the vengeance of his former bosses—two of them ex-convicts—we will identify him fictitiously as Joe Mangin, and the outfit he worked for as Globe Business Trade. Globe occupies an entire floor in a La Salle Street skyscraper, employs 85 salesmen, who retain 35 percent of every fee they snag, and grosses around $3 million a year. Mangin, a married man of 40 with three children and a mountain of unpaid bills, joined the company at the urging of a friend employed there, after he lost his job as an insurance adjuster. "You'll be out of debt in 6 months," the friend told him. He understated the case.

Globe's personnel manager first put the novice through an intensive 2-week course in the arts of obfuscation— how to extract bigger advance payments, how to insure the victim's secrecy, how to help him misinterpret the contract. He then provided him with a sheaf of post cards that had been sent back from an Indiana farm county and sped him on his way. "They build up their sucker lists," Mangin explains, "from the yellow pages of phone books, business directories, real estate ads and such. In addition to a monthly catalog, they issue, as an added convincer, lists of so-called handpicked, ready buyers. A lot of those buyers they practically invent."

One Globe salesman, Mangin recalls, pausing in his frantic rounds to refresh himself at a soda fountain, observed a small girl of about 11 devouring a banana split. "Little lady," said he, "how would you like to own your own soda fountain?" The moppet said she would like it fine. So he jotted down her name and address, which duly appeared in Globe's confidential list below the announcement: "Wanted to buy—fully equipped up-to-date pharmacy."

Like most advance-fee operators, Globe claims that thousands of affiliated real estate brokers receive its catalog. "The catalog goes to a few brokers, all right, unsolicited and free of charge," says Mangin. "That's to fulfill the letter of the contract. Only the brokers aren't exactly affiliated. In fact, they probably never heard of the company. The catalog wouldn't be much good to them anyway. How many Florida brokers, do you suppose, have clients dying to run a pizzeria in Maine? They just toss the catalog in the trash basket." Attorney Brookfield corroborates this. Of the real estate men he questioned, not one had ever found the slightest use for any advance-fee literature.

Mangin prospered. The first 6 weeks he conned $12,000 out of 40 Hoosiers, none of whom sold his property through Globe. Do the advance-fee pirates, then, never effect a sale? The FTC estimates the percentage at less than one-half of 1 percent.

Being an imaginative man, Mangin went on to refine certain modi operandi of the racket. Before descending upon an intended victim, he would telephone to say, "You don't know it, but our bonded appraisers have appraised your property—discreetly, mind you. We realize you wouldn't want your community to know you're planning a change. Bad for credit. Now, I've got a buyer sitting right beside me in my office. Matter of fact, my company never approaches a seller unless there's a sure buyer on hand."

With the victim thus primed, Mangin would request an appointment. Whatever date was chosen, he would plead prior business, and set a later date. This is known as negative selling, the object being to heighten the victim's impatience. When Mangin finally entered the establishment, he would glance about with a practiced air, sagely nod, and pretend to consult a file card on which he had scribbled three digits. Let us see how matters progressed in the case of an asthmatic, 70-year-old farm-implement dealer of South Bend, Ind., whom Mangin refers to as Marvin Wheatley.

"Mr. Wheatley," said the con man, "what do you figure your present inventory is worth?"

The merchant put it at $70,000. ("I knew he was lying. They almost always do.")

With a pen Mangin circled the first digit. "That's just about what our appraisers figure too. What's your gross annual business?"

"Seventy-five thousand dollars?" It was more a question than a statement.

"Yes, indeed, that checks," said Mangin, circling the second digit. "And your net?"

"Around $20,000."

Mangin feigned astonishment. "Now, that's funny. We only show $15,000."

Wheatley's jaw dropped. "Where in blazes do you get your dope? You're right; I did stretch it a little."

"I'm sorry, my friend, but we can't divulge our sources of information. Every last item is thoroughly verified though. We use electronic calculators. What's your asking price?"

"I'd take $50,000."

"Mr. Wheatley, my friend, you're kidding. Why, this business is worth $60,000 if its worth a dime, and that's how you ought to list it."

Wheatley happily assented.

"The buyer we have for you," Mangin rattled on at dizzying speed, "has deposited $5,000 with us as surety that he won't back out. You've got to do likewise, of course. We charge 3 percent of the sale price. That'll entitle you to a fine, big, half-page ad in our nationally distributed magazine. One percent in advance." This last condition he glossed over, and to direct Wheatley's mind away from it, as well as to establish his own scrupulousness, he added, "We'll require a clear title to the property. You understand, we must protect both buyer and seller."

Wheatley mustered enough common sense to ask the obvious question, "Why advertise if the deal's all set?"

"Because, my friend," Mangin suavely informed him, "my company can't operate any other way. While we promote real estate, we don't handle the actual sale. You can appoint your own broker to do that, if you prefer."

"Suppose the deal falls through?"

"Listen carefully to this clause in our contract," and he read it fast: " 'This agreement shall become effective when accepted at the home office of Globe Business Trade. In the event this agreement is not accepted by G.B.T. the entire fee will be refunded.' "

Wishful thinking led Wheatley to interpret acceptance as meaning the buyer's acceptance of his property instead of Globe's acceptance of the advertising contract. He wrote a check for $600.

Upon sober reflection some dupes have been known to stop payment. To lull any doubts that might beset Wheatley, Mangin resorted to one of his favorite bits of flummery. He left the check behind, returning for it later in the day with the sheepish grin of an honest but scatterbrained fellow. "How about that!" he exclaimed. "I clean forgot the most important item. Well, I'll just hang on to the check till the acceptance comes through." He cashed it in the next town.

A queasy conscience compelled Mangin to quit the racket after 3 triumphant years. "What finally decided me," he recounts, "was this little old cigarstore owner in Kansas—wife sick, the bank threatening foreclosure. I have his check for $270 in my pocket, when he steps out from behind the counter, and I see he's crippled in both legs. I telephoned him later that the deal was off, and tore up the check."

Such qualms do not inhibit every advance-fee salesman. In upper New York State real estate investigators, responding to the complaint of an aged fruit farmer, found him prostrate on his back porch, his face stubbled with a 3 days' growth. He was too infirm to shave, let alone tend his orchard. A recent victim, in Greenwich, Conn., was a motel owner past 70, the poorer by $350, whose wife lay dying of cancer. In Wisconsin an old dairyman paid a $400 fee without reading the contract. He couldn't. He was blind.

Among the few advance-fee firms which the law has been able to obstruct were National Property & Business Exchange, Business Mart of America, Charles Ford & Associates, Business Co-Op, Coast to Coast Service, American Business Exchange, and World Wide Brokerage—the first two with headquarters in Los Angeles, the others in Chicago. Though they all followed the same fundamental principles, their sales techniques varied widely.

National Business, until 1956 California's biggest advance-fee operators—president, Alexander Haagen; executive vice president, Michael M. Fodor—developed a particularly persuasive line. Its pitchmen exacted no immediate payment. The contract, however, was tantamount to a promissory note. If the sum agreed to failed to arrive within the prescribed period, the corporation would sue. Few victims could afford the legal expenses of a defense, so that the court had no choice but to grant judgment, and the contractual sum became automatically collectible. With rueful humor a Kansas victim wrote to the FTC: "Gee, my property was sold! It was sold to satisfy a judgment."

National Business' dazzling 300-odd page catalog featured letters solicited from State governors seeming to endorse its activities. All the letters actually did was to extol the glories of the State, without any mention of the corporation ("Pennsylvania is a picturesque, diversified, friendly, scenically beautiful State full of major historic shrines.") But they impressed the victims.

Two associates of National Business, Paul Meyer Guyer and Theodore M. Bernardi, broke away to launch a network of eight advance-fee firms stretching clear across the country. The objects of numerous complaints, they are at present defendants against charges brought by the FTC. Among the exhibits is an affidavit from a penitent former employee, Colvin Buford: "My sales instructor told me not to limit my sales talk to what was in the printed contract form, but to enlarge the representations to include promises that the firm had many eager prospective buyers." To questions challenging his integrity Guyer retorts with crushing dignity: "I am a publisher."

For sheer gall Business Co-Op, headed by one William John Madone, has seldom been surpassed. To its intended victims it distributed a booklet titled "How To Sell Your Business and Beat the Con Men," which fully exposed the methods of advance fee-manship, notably Madone's. The salesmen, posing as the only exemplars of probity in a wicked world, would then proceed to gull the victims through the selfsame methods.

The best-educated man to have been accused of working the racket is probably a former Federal prisoner named William Muchnick, alias William Maurice. A graduate engineer, thrice married, Muchnick spent 8 years behind bars for mail frauds. The warden of Leavenworth Penitentiary remembered him as one of the brightest minds ever incarcerated there. Two years ago, at the age of 70, though suffering from a weak heart and a lame leg, he incorporated Coast to Coast Service. Complainants who received disclaimers of wrongdoing from him were bemused by the slogan on his letterhead: "Our Reputation Is Our Most Cherished Possession." In April of 1958 the FTC filed charges against Coast to Coast. Its Chicago headquarters, however, had been closed for several months. At last reports Muchnick was residing at a fine hotel in New York. An early collaborator in Coast to Coast, Louis Parell, also known as Parelli, organized American Business Exchange, which the FTC put out of business.

A penetrating glimpse into the psychology of advance-fee victims was afforded the Senate subcommittee by another felon, William Parker, who is now serving 20 months in the Atlanta Penitentiary for a vending machine swindle. His previous offenses include passing bad checks and misusing Government travel vouchers. It was doubtless in hopes of a reduced sentence that he volunteered to testify before the subcommittee. For 14 months, from 1956 to 1957, Parker was employed by Charles Ford & Associates of the West, later renamed Business Mart of America, against which a preliminary injunction has been issued prohibiting its activities in nine States. During that period Parker's commissions totaled $18,000. What surprised Senator JACKSON most in his testimony was his insistence that a victim once bitten, far from being twice shy, offered the next con man who happened along an easy target.

"It's a matter of ego," Parker maintained. "He feels he's made the right choice of method. He's put up his money, and his judgment is involved. Now he's mad at the company. Here comes a new company who claims he made all the right choices except he picked the wrong company. He's delighted to find that his judgment was originally right."

"Or," interpolated Senator JACKSON, "once a sucker always a sucker."

"Some of these people loved it," continued Parker. "It's like a crooked roulette wheel; it's the only one in town. They'd continue to go."

Expressing profound sympathy, Parker would spot such victims a discount equal to the amount of which they had been defrauded by the competition.

There are innocents who have been victimized repeatedly. "Within the last 3 years," one of them wrote to the FTC, "I have paid $520 to sell my business and never heard from any buyers. The Business Opportunities Co., Evanston, Ill., called me collect and said they had a buyer for my greenhouse and for me to forward a $60 check at once. Also, the Charles Ford Association of Chicago collected $300 and took two oil paintings valued at $100 a painting. Another Chicago company also took me in 1952 for $162. I now have on hand a collector's suit for $1,475 from National Business & Property Exchange."

Nor did those victims who sensibly consulted their lawyers before signing—in Parker's experience, 30 to 40 percent of them—present any insuperable problem. The lawyer would not have been present during the preliminary verbal shenanigans; all that confronted him would be a bona fide advertising contract. Moreover, "In most cities lawyers can act as brokers without extra licenses. We'd simply designate them in the contract as selling agents. We'd tell them they could get from 2 to 3 percent of the sale price. Naturally they'd approve the deal."

The witness went on to describe some of Business Mart's other sure-fire tricks. Its salesmen carried cameras to photograph the property for sale before opening negotiations, later showing the victim prints as evidence of the appraisers' efforts. At the home office, they claimed, appraisals were fed to an electronic brain which instantly matched buyers and sellers. To convince the victim that Business Mart didn't accept just any old customer, they exhibited photostats of some 30 letters of rejection, a negative selling stratagem. Everything about the letters was genuine except the reason alleged for having sent them. "Those rejections," said Parker, "were always mailed out when the check bounced."

Chicago, that fecund mother of rackets, spawned the advance-fee racket. Through its early history, dating from 1950, runs the trade name, Charles Ford & Associates, Inc., which opened its headquarters in Chicago in July of that year. Complaints against it soon flooded better business bureaus and State realty boards. Ford's founder—in his peculiar field, a brilliant innovator—is a former Chicago furrier named Charles C. Solk. A silvery haired, bespectacled man of ministerial mien, Solk contends with evangelical fervor that he has been the benefactor of untold numbers of small businessmen. At the outset the noted business analyst, Willard M. Kiplinger, tended to agree. This is what the Kiplinger magazine, Changing Times, reported in its issue of December 1952, under the title, "How To Buy (or Sell) Your Business":

"The Nation's largest business brokerage service, Charles Ford & Associates, of Chicago, has 260 associated brokers scattered across the United States and in Hawaii. The firm will handle about $300 million in business sales this year, but to attain this volume, Ford advertises for buyers and sellers in 1,500 newspapers and 200 trade papers and on some 50 radio stations. Ford publishes a monthly Business for Sale directory that averages more than 300 pages and lists upward of 2,000 business offerings throughout the United States. The directory goes to 9,000 brokers, realtors, bankers, and prospective buyers. In addition, Ford maintains 2 files, 1 that lists some 24,000 businesses for sale, another that contains thousands of names of buyer prospects. These files are constantly cross-checked to match buyers and sellers. No business is listed for sale before it has been inspected and appraised, and approved as a good risk.

"There are many other good brokers, of course, but Ford with its nationwide affiliation of brokers comes closest to being a kind of national stock exchange for business transfer."

This endorsement, of which Ford reprinted thousands of copies, proved to be magnificent promotional literature. Its salesmen scarcely required an oral pitch. By 1955, however, Kiplinger had radically revised his opinion. In a Changing Times article titled "Be Wary of Phony Business Brokers," he depicted Ford a good deal less favorably.

Between the publication of these two articles several contretemps befell President Solk. Nine States and Hawaii refused to issue Ford operating licenses. In Michigan the Corporation and Securities Commission, acting upon complaints from four property owners who had forked over a total of $2,570, accused Solk of fraudulently failing to provide guaranteed services. He was placed under civil arrest. The court released him after he posted a bond equivalent to the amount paid by the complainants, but no further action was taken because a Ford vice president, Edward A. Chapman, had already surrendered the firm's Michigan license. Chapman had also resigned, declaring that he had discovered the business to be "something in the nature of a racket."

The original organization, meanwhile, had been split up into four companies—Charles Ford & Associates of the Midwest, with Solk and his son, Leroy, at the helm (headquarters, Chicago); Charles Ford of the East (New York); Charles Ford of the West, later reincorporated as Business Mart of America (Hollywood); Charles Ford of the South. All have been accused of fraud either by private individuals or by State licensing officials. The first two have been liquidated. The last two still flourish.

The original Ford's executive vice president, Thomas G. Dudley, resigned to start his own company under the same trade name. Solk brought suit to enjoin him from using it; Dudley then wound up as head of Trans-Continental Clearing House. The attorney who represented him in the Solk litigation, Thomas E. Joyce, became so entranced by the advance-fee business that he founded World Wide Brokerage. The FTC has since issued a complaint against Trans-Continental and a cease-and-desist order against World Wide.

Typical of the complaints lodged against Solk's Ford of the Midwest was one, last July, from a James G. Moore, of Port Huron, Mich., who wanted to be rid of his Blue Water Ferry Co. He advanced Ford $300 upon a salesman's promise to turn up "bona fide buyer prospects." Two names were eventually given him; Walter Stoll, of Kalamazoo, and Colvin's Marine Storage in Ludington, Mich. Moore hopefully got in touch with them. Stoll replied, "I am afraid Charles Ford & Associates are not very accurate in the service they advertise. I have been seeking a small chemical company or plastic manufacturing company." Said Colvin's Marine Storage: "Don't let Ford kid you—we are no more interested in a ferry than we are in a sputnik to the moon."

By way of justification Solk argued:

"Webster's dictionary defines bona fide as 'in or with good faith, without fraud or deceit, authentic, genuine.' What we submitted to Mr. Moore were the names of two genuine or authentic buyer prospects who had contacted us for the purposes of purchasing a business in the nature of Mr. Moore's, that is: a marine business. * * * A buyer who lists with us, for one reason or another, may not be particularly interested in each business within his category that is submitted to him. That cannot be helped * * * many laymen have been confused by the words 'bona fide buyer prospect' as set forth in our contract, and therefore in order to protect both them and ourselves we have completely eliminated this provision.

Pioneer Solk, a cautious character who when talking to strangers in his plushy North Clark Street office has been known to switch on a concealed tape recorder, is no longer connected with the enterprise he created. He concedes that his successors commit flagrant deceptions, but insists that under his presidency Charles Ford's activities were immaculate. "I now have many other interests," he says. "I am a finance and management consultant." Among these interests is Casey & Associates, which offers to arrange loans of money for a percentage payable in advance.

The factors that continue to hamper official efforts to stamp out the advance-fee racket are many and complex. First of all, no impropriety attaches to the practice of charging advance fees for specific business services. Numerous reputable concerns do so. Their representatives, however, avoid unfulfillable claims; they make serious, constructive surveys of buyer-and-seller markets; and they frequently bring about satisfactory deals. Previews, Inc., of New York, for example (see the Saturday Evening Post, March 7, 1953), which promotes choice properties the world over, sells about 75 percent of them at an advance commission of 1 to 1½ percent. The primary legislative problem, then, is to fashion a net that will destroy the sharks without harming the honest market fish.

State laws aimed at the racket have thus far proved tough to enforce. In 1955 California enacted an amendment to its real estate statutes requiring advance-fee advertisers, publishers, and salesmen to possess the same kind of license as real estate brokers. Union Interchange and Universal Interchange, two of the Guyer-Bernardi corporation, challenged the amendment on constitutional grounds, contending that since they were not, in fact, brokers, the amendment was discriminatory. Similarily, in Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Connecticut, advance-fee lobbies have defeated attempts to classify the business as real estate brokerage. Furthermore, even if State laws could be made to stick, they would not eliminate the racket, because it is essentially an interstate racket. The solution would seem to be Federal legislation.

Such legislation has been proposed by Senators MUNDT and JOHN L. MCCLELLAN, with the support of the National Association of License Law Officials and the Western Attorneys General. Under a bill which MUNDT submitted to Congress, anybody who obtains through false representation a service contract incident to the sale of property shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both. That, the Senator feels, should discourage the brashest advance-fee racketeers.

Meanwhile, pending the passage of the Mundt bill, or one like it, the wisest course for property owners who are tempted by the blandishments of advance feemen is to heed the advice, published after a second look at Charles Ford & Associates, in Kiplinger's Changing Times:

"Check the credentials of the salesman, but don't put too much faith in them.

"Check on his firm with Better Business Bureaus and State licensing bodies.

"Read the contract carefully, preferably with the aid of a lawyer. Expect to get exactly what is in the contract and no more.

"Ask yourself whether you could more cheaply insert your own ads in trade publications and newspapers.

"Then hesitate some more."

NONNAVIGABILITY OF CERTAIN PORTIONS OF STREAMS IN HOUMA, LA.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] a bill which would declare nonnavigable, for purposes of the commerce clause of the Constitution, certain portions of two streams which flow through my hometown of Houma, La.

We are introducing this proposed legislation at the request of the city council of the city of Houma, and the police jury of the parish of Terrebonne, La. At this time, I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions adopted by these two bodies, requesting this legislation, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. I also ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point a survey made by the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce on the same subject.

I assume, Mr. President, that this legislation will be referred to the Committee on Public Works. In this connection, I want to urge the committee to act as quickly as possible on this bill. However, I am most anxious for all interested parties to be given an opportunity to place their views on record, before the bill is finally considered by the committee.

I ask unanimous consent that two letters and a resolution relating to the subject matter of this proposed legislation be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letters and resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 551) to declare portions of Bayous Terrebonne and LeCarpe, La., to be nonnavigable streams, introduced by Mr. ELLENDER (for himself and Mr. LONG), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The letters and resolution presented by Mr. ELLENDER are as follows:

CITY OF HOUMA,
Houma, La.

Mr. Frank King, secretary-manager of the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce, appeared before the board and presented 10 additional reports on the survey of the affected property owners relative to the closing of Bayou Terrebonne for the attention of the board. Mr. King, when questioned, stated that any property owner who might be affected by the closing of the Bayou Terrebonne had been given a chance to voice any objections which he might have to this closing.

MOTION

Mr. Autin moved that the report as submitted by the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce on the results of its survey relative to the closing of Bayou Terrebonne be received and that the results of this survey be forwarded to the proper congressional delegation, motion seconded by Mr. Haydel and unanimously voted.

Certified to be a true and correct copy of motion duly offered, seconded, and adopted at the regular meeting of the mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Houma, La., held March 12, 1958.

ROBERT F. BOURG,
City Clerk.

HOUMA-TERREBONNE
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Houma, La., December 5, 1958.

Hon. LEON GARY,
Mayor, City of Houma, Houma, La.

DEAR MAYOR GARY: In early February 1958 the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce made a survey of the property owners adjacent to Bayou Terrebonne for the purpose of ascertaining what objections, if any, would be raised to the closing of Bayou Terrebonne to navigation from the Barrow Street Bridge west to the St. Louis Canal.

A committee of 8 members of the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce made a survey involving the 95 property owners bordering the bayou from Barrow Street to the St. Louis Canal, and asked the following questions:

1. Do you use, or have use of, that part of Bayou Terrebonne from the St. Charles Street Bridge to the Barrow Street Bridge?

2. If you do have use of that part of Bayou Terrebonne, for what purpose do you use it?

3. To meet present-day traffic requirements, would you be in favor of permanent-type bridges to, and including, Barrow Street?

4. If not, what are your reasons?

Three objections were registered against the closing of Bayou Terrebonne. These objections came from the Houma Ice Co., Terrebonne Ice Co., and Mr. and Mrs. Horace Authement.

We were happy to have made this survey in cooperation with the city of Houma, and if we can be of further assistance, please let us know.

Sincerely,

FRANK E. KING,
Manager, Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Terrebonne:

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared, Frank E. King, Jr., a resident of the parish of Terrebonne, La., who being duly sworn did depose and say that he is the manager of the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce, and that the foregoing statement and information is true and correct and is on file and of record in the office of the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce, 306 Church Street, Houma, La.

My commission is issued for life.

Mr. R. Pellegrin offered the following resolution:

"A resolution requesting the Congress of the United States of America to close to navigation Bayou LaCarpe from Barrow Street to a point 300 feet west of the Intracoastal Waterway and to close Bayou Terrebonne from Barrow Street to the St. Louis Canal, which points are all within the municipal limits of the city of Houma, parish of Terrebonne, La.

"Whereas the mayor and Board of Aldermen of the City of Houma have received a petition signed by all of the property owners fronting on Bayou LaCarpe between Barrow Street and 300 feet west of the Intracoastal Canal, petitioning that said stream be closed to navigation and that culverts be installed in that stream for draining purposes and that permanent bridges be constructed over said stream; and

"Whereas a survey of the property owners owning property fronting on Bayou Terrebonne between Barrow Street and St. Louis Canal have indicated that all, with four exceptions, desire that said stream be closed to water traffic in order to allow the city of Houma to build permanent-type bridges over said stream to relieve traffic congestion; and

"Whereas it is necessary that the Congress of the United States of America enact proper legislation to close said streams to water traffic: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Police Jury of the Parish of Terrebonne, State of Louisiana:

"SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned to close to navigation Bayou LaCarpe from Barrow Street to a point 300 feet west of the Intracoastal Canal and to close to navigation Bayou Terrebonne from Barrow Street to the St. Louis Canal, which points are all within the city of Houma, Parish of Terrebonne, La.

"SEC. 2. That the closing of Bayou LaCarpe to navigation is necessary to allow the city of Houma to place culverts in said Bayou LaCarpe for drainage purposes and to eradicate a health menace.

"SEC. 3. That the closing of Bayou Terrebonne to navigation is necessary to enable the city of Houma to construct permanent-type bridges across said stream to eliminate traffic congestion within the city of Houma."

The foregoing resolution having been reduced to writing was read and considered section by section and as a whole and upon roll call was adopted by the following vote: Yeas, 12; nays, 0.

AMENDMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936, RELATING TO MORTGAGE AND LOAN INSURANCE

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend mortgage and loan insurance to foreign-flag vessels constructed in U.S. shipyards. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with an explanatory memorandum, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 555) to amend title XI of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, in order to provide mortgage and loan insurance for the construction, reconstruction or reconditioning of vessels in shipyards in the continental United States, introduced by Mr. BUTLER, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Ship Mortgage Insurance Amendments of 1959".

SEC. 2. Clause (c) of section 1101 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a comma and the following: "except that with respect to a mortgage meeting the requirements of section 1104(a)(8)(D) or a loan meeting the requirements of section 1104(b)(2)(C), documentation under the laws of the United States shall not be required if the vessel is a documented foreign vessel as described in subsection (k) of the Ship Mortgage Act, 1920".

SEC. 3. Clause (8) of subsection (a) of section 1104 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, is amended to read as follows:

"(8) shall secure a loan made to aid in financing, including payment of loans previously made to finance, and reimbursement of the mortgagor for expenditures previously made for—

"(A) construction (including designing, inspecting, outfitting, and equipping) of vessels under title V of this Act, as amended:

"(B) the purchase by citizens of the United States of vessels for use on the Great Lakes pursuant to the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, as amended;

"(C) the construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning (including designing, inspecting, outfitting, and equipping), subsequent to the enactment of this title, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States which are designed principally for commercial use (i) in the coastwise or intracoastal trade, (ii) on the Great Lakes, or on bays, sounds, rivers, harbors, or inland lakes of the United States, (iii) in foreign trade, or (iv) in the fishing trade or industry; or

"(D) the construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning (including designing, inspecting, outfitting, and equipping), after the date of enactment of the Federal Ship Mortgage Insurance Amendments of 1958, of vessels in shipyards in the continental United States."

SEC. 4. Clause (2) of subsection (b) of section 1104 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, is amended to read as follows:

"(2) shall be made to aid in financing, including payment of loans previously made to finance, and reimbursement of the borrower for expenditures previously made for—

"(A) construction (including designing, inspecting, outfitting, and equipping) of vessels under title V of this Act, as amended;

"(B) the construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning (including designing, inspecting, outfitting, and equipping) subsequent to the enactment of this title, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States which are designed principally for commercial use (A) in the coastwise or intercoastal trade, (B) on the Great Lakes or on bays, sounds, rivers, harbors, or inland lakes of the United States, (C) in foreign trade, or (D) in the fishing trade or industry; or

"(C) the construction, reconstruction, or reconditioning (including designing, inspecting, outfitting, and equipping), after the date of enactment of the Federal Ship Mortgage Insurance Amendments of 1958, of vessels in shipyards in the continental United States."

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUTLER

Legislation is proposed to extend the mortgage and insurance guaranty provisions of the Merchant Marine Act to foreign-flag vessels built and/or repaired in shipyards in the continental United States. Under the present law the Maritime Administration insures mortgages only on ships constructed for United States-flag registry. The main purpose of this legislation is to secure for American shipyards some of the shipbuilding and repair business which now goes elsewhere. One of the barriers to obtaining contracts for construction of foreign-flag vessels in American shipyards has been the large capital outlay required and the difficulty of financing. Several foreign steamship operators have expressed an interest in having work done in American shipyards should financing be made less difficult.

The benefits which would accrue from the additional shipbuilding business as a result of this bill would more than outweigh any possible disadvantages resulting from encouraging the building up of foreign-flag merchant marines which compete with our own lines. In all probability ships for foreign-flag operations will continue to be built anyway, but in foreign shipyards instead of American.

Extending the mortgage insurance program to foreign-flag vessels built in the United States would not involve any direct outlay of funds by the Federal Government. The borrower, under the mortgage guaranty, would pay an annual premium into the Government account. Builders would be required to advance one-eighth of the cost as equity money and mortgage liquidation would start with construction. By the time the vessel was ready to be put into service the lien would be reduced to approximately 80 percent of the construction cost.

The new law would probably attract chiefly orders for construction of various types of bulk carriers, the class of vessels in which our merchant fleet is deficient. On the basis of past experience on ships sold to foreign operators under the Ship Sales Act of 1946, on which we have had an excellent record of payments, few defaults would be likely to occur under the mortgage insurance program. But, in the event of default there would be no difficulty in taking over the mortgaged vessel and the worst that could happen would be a modern ship which would be available at a reduced cost to our merchant fleet.

We have been spending billions of dollars for foreign aid during the past several years and some of these funds have doubtless been used to restore the depleted foreign-flag merchant fleets. The foreign shipbuilding industry has been in very good condition since the end of World War II. Adoption of this amendment to permit mortgage insurance would provide a stimulus for a considerable amount of this ship construction to be done in United States shipyards. Mortgage and insurance guaranty would be a very beneficial type of foreign aid and in all probability would cost us nothing. This type of maritime financing has thus far been profitable to the Government and extension of the program should make it even more lucrative.

With no immediate outlay, contracts for foreign-flag ships secured for the United States shipyards will result in more work and will provide greater stability in the shipbuilding industry, which is of national importance both economically and from a defense standpoint. Volume construction consequent upon foreign orders made possible by this legislation will result in lower cost of construction for United States ships because a major cost in shipbuilding is overhead and added volume means a wider range of work over which to spread the overhead costs. The cost of Federal support of the shipbuilding industry would be reduced as differences in the cost of building a vessel in American shipyards and in foreign shipyards decrease.

There can be no valid objection to this proposed legislation because the results will be beneficial to the shipbuilding industry of the United States, will narrow the margin between American and foreign shipbuilding costs, and redound to the general economic improvement. A likely bonus will be the promotion of good will toward the United States among many foreign groups, an eventuality which should not be discounted.

AMENDMENT OF WELFARE AND PENSION PLANS DISCLOSURE ACT

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

I supported this proposed legislation when it was passed by the House of Representatives last year. However, I said at that time the bill had been so watered down as to fail to accomplish the purpose for which it was intended.

When S. 2888 was passed by the Senate it contained stronger administrative requirements and penalties—which were eliminated by the House, and never restored in full strength.

The bill which I introduce today will restore teeth to the law.

It grants authority to the Secretary of Labor to prescribe rules and regulations necessary to carry out reporting procedures; it gives discretionary action to the Secretary to make investigations of violations, to publish information concerning them, and to bring suit for the protection of beneficiaries. It restores stringent penalties for violations, false statements, diversions or misuse of funds. It prohibits anyone who has been convicted of any offense against the laws of the United States from acting as officer, trustee, or custodian of such funds.

Mr. President, these provisions are designed not only to help the beneficiaries of plans, but to fortify the vast majority of pension-plan administrators who are trying to do a good job.

My interest is in protecting the working man and woman—whether they are participating in a welfare or pension plan conducted by a labor union or by management. In both areas there is opportunity for skullduggery—for which we should provide preventive measures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 567) to amend the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act, introduced by Mr. SCOTT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

INCLUSION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES IN CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to bring employees of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation County Committees within the Civil Service Retirement Act and Federal Employees' Group Life Insurance Act of 1954. A companion bill has been introduced in the House by Representative JAMIE WHITTEN.

For a number of years it has been a matter of deep concern to ASC county committeemen, as well as other agricultural leaders, that employees of the ASC service are not eligible for retirement and insurance benefits available to other Federal employees.

The present ASC has undergone several name changes during the past 25 years. Nevertheless, it has been a continuous Government program since 1934. These Federal employees are dedicated men who, working at the county level, have done an exceptionally good job of initiating and encouraging improvement programs for all types of farms. These programs include the ACP, the acreage allotments and marketing quota program, the Soil Bank program, the CCC, the commodity and farm storage loan programs, wool incentive payments, and other various emergency programs assigned to them. These employees make a real contribution in the administration of these programs. Each program involves thorough knowledge and study, so heavy workloads are the rule.

A great many of the ASC county employees are really career employees. Many have worked continuously since 1934. However, under present law they are not eligible for civil service retirement and insurance. Those employees now at retirement age find social security benefits a good deal less than the retirement benefits they never had a chance to earn.

Other Federal employees and Federal-State employees, such as county extension agents, SCS technicians, FHA supervisors, are covered under the Civil Service Act, yet ASC employees who receive their full pay from the Federal Government are left out. They should be eligible for benefits provided civil service employees.

The bill which I have introduced would not place the ASC employees under the regular civil service system, but would make them eligible for retirement and insurance benefits. The county committee would retain complete control over employees' tenure. The plan is similar to the one now in effect for the Extension Service.

Mr. President, the provisions of this bill would give ASC employees benefits now enjoyed by other Federal employees at the county level and would correct a serious inequity in present law. I urge the Senate Agriculture Committee to give full consideration to this proposed legislation at the earliest possible date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 563) to bring employees of agricultural stabilization and conservation county committees within the purview of the Civil Service Retirement Act and the Federal Employees' Group Life Insurance Act of 1954, introduced by Mr. STENNIS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

REIMBURSEMENT TO THE STATES FOR CERTAIN FREE OR TOLL ROADS ON INTERSTATE SYSTEM

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize reimbursement to the States for certain free or toll roads on the Interstate System, and for other purposes, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Works.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement in explanation of the bill and the text of the bill may be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 570) to authorize reimbursement to the States for certain free or toll roads on the Interstate System, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BUSH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the policy of the Federal Government to equitably reimburse a State for free or toll highways on the Interstate System within its boundaries, the construction of which has been completed or partially completely subsequent to August 2, 1947, or which was either in actual construction, or under construction, by contract, for completion, awarded not later than June 30, 1957, if such highway or partially completed section thereof meets the standards required for the Interstate System.

SEC. 2. If an existing free or toll highway or partially completed section of highway which is located upon the Interstate System and included in the report submitted to Congress under section 114 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 (70 Stat. 374) (House Document numbered 301, Eighty-fifth Congress), is believed to measure up to the standards of construction adopted under section 108 (i) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956, a State may request of the Secretary of Commerce that it receive reimbursement for such highway, and the State shall be entitled to receive such reimbursement subject to the conditions of this Act. The Secretary of Commerce shall first determine whether or not the highway, or partially completed section of highway, meets such standards. If he approves the same, the Secretary of Commerce shall determine, in accordance with the rules and regulations issued pursuant to section 4 hereof, the amount of reimbursement to which the State is entitled based on the cost of such highway, less depreciation and the total amount of any Federal funds used in the construction of such highway. In each such determination for a toll highway, the Secretary shall also exclude from the cost of the highway the cost of financing thereof and the cost of any toll plazas, toll collection facilities, and any other facilities not included within the definition of the term "highway" under Federal-aid highway legislation.

SEC. 3. Any State entitled to reimbursement under this Act, whether for a toll or a free highway or a partially completed section of highway, shall use the funds so reimbursed, first, for construction of projects on free highways which connect with the Interstate System and enhance the utility of such system; and then, if there be any funds remaining after completion of such projects, on any Federal-aid system, subject to the condition that all Federal-aid highway funds apportioned to a State under Federal-aid highway legislation for the current fiscal year have been expended within the meaning of said legislation. Whenever a State constructs such projects with funds received as a result of a reimbursement under this Act, all procedures and steps shall be taken in the same manner as though such funds had been apportioned under Federal-aid highway legislation: Provided, That State matching funds shall not be required: And provided further, That the funds received as a result of a reimbursement under this section shall constitute the total Federal share of any project upon which such funds are expended. The State shall obligate the amounts to which it is entitled to be reimbursed under this section prior to July 1, 1974, and any portion of such amount not so obligated shall lapse. No State shall be permitted to obligate in any one fiscal year more than 10 percent of the amount to which it is entitled to be reimbursed under this section.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of Commerce shall establish such rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

The statement presented by Mr. BUSH is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUSH

I have introduced in the Senate today a bill to provide fair and equitable reimbursement to States which have constructed sections of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways to the required standards with either State or toll financing.

My bill would:

1. Declare it to be the policy of the Federal Government to reimburse equitably the States for acceptable highways, free or toll, which have been incorporated into the Interstate System.

2. Authorize the Secretary of Commerce to provide reimbursement, upon request of a State, if he determines such highways meet interstate standards. The amount of reimbursement would be limited to the cost of the highway, less depreciation and the total amount of Federal funds used in its construction. In the case of toll highways, the reimbursement would be further reduced by deductions for the cost of all auxiliary facilities needed for its toll operation.

3. Require the States to use the funds for construction of projects on highways which connect with the Interstate System and enhance its utility and, after completion of such projects, on any Federal-aid system. No State matching funds would be required.

Concern has been expressed about the cost of reimbursement, which has been estimated by the Bureau of Public Roads at approximately $4.2 billion, about equally divided between toll and free highways. In order to avoid an excessive addition to the normal flow of Federal highway funds in any single year, the bill provides that a State shall have until July 1, 1974, to obligate reimbursed funds to its credit, with a proviso that no more than 10 percent of the total credit may be obligated in any one fiscal year.

It is equally important to recognize what the bill would not do, particularly with respect to the proposal for reimbursement for toll roads:

1. It would not give any State a so-called windfall because if the State had not had the initiative to construct the highway, the Federal Government would have had to finance its construction with 90 percent Federal funds under the terms of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956.

2. It would not violate the prohibition against use of Federal funds on toll highways because any funds reimbursed would have to be spent on highways which are toll free.

My bill is intended to implement the recommendations of the President's Advisory Committee on a National Highway Program, headed by Gen. Lucius D. Clay, for completion of the Interstate System.

The Clay Committee recognized that unless reimbursement were provided the fact that a radically new highway program was under consideration might lead States to delay their plans for modernizing their interstate highways. Accordingly, the Clay Committee strongly recommended reimbursement, and in the faith that Congress would recognize the equity and justice of their position many States proceeded with construction of their interstate highways.

I quote pertinent sections of the Clay committee's report:

"Some States have already constructed sections of the Interstate System to the required standards with either State or toll financing and others are proceeding along similar lines. Such construction should not be discouraged by this report, since our goal is maximum highway improvement. Those States in which sections of the Interstate System have been provided to meet the presently established standards for the completed system should receive appropriate credit, provided such funds are used to improve other roads on established Federal-aid systems or as may be approved by the Federal Government and all other Federal funds for highway purposes have been matched as required. No funds should be made available as a credit for toll roads unless the returns from tolls above financing requirements are used exclusively for road construction as contemplated above. * * *

"The funds thus made available to the States will not only encourage matching of available funds, but will also make possible accelerated improvement of primary, secondary, and other roads, and will encourage local financing of interstate mileage to make funds available for other roads without increasing total Federal responsibility. They will be paid to the States only as required to meet the costs of projects approved for construction, and it thus appears would provide a major incentive to the highway-improvement program as a whole."

Although many Members of Congress fought hard for the Clay Committee's principle of reimbursement when the 1956 act was under consideration, a decision was postponed at that time. The act merely contains a declaration that it was the intent of Congress to determine whether or not reimbursement should be made to the States for highways, toll or free, which had been completed or put under construction on the Interstate System between August 2, 1947, and June 30, 1957.

The 86th Congress should now make that determination, and fairness and justice require that reimbursement be granted. Otherwise severe penalties will be imposed against the very States which made the most progress in modernizing the Interstate System within their borders.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AVIATION ACT OF 1958, RELATING TO SALE OF GOODS AND SERVICES

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the sale of goods and services by any department or independent establishment to the owner of an aircraft or his agent in an emergency, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense requesting the proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 576) to amend section 1107 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to authorize the sale of goods and services by any department or independent establishment to the owner of an aircraft or his agent in an emergency, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, December 22, 1958.

Hon. RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith a draft of legislation to amend section 1107 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to authorize the sale of goods and services by any department or independent establishment to the owner of an aircraft or his agent in an emergency, and for other purposes.

This proposal is a part of the Department of Defense legislative program for 1959, and the Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the presentation of this proposal for the consideration of the Congress. The Department of the Air Force has been designated as the representative of the Department of Defense for this legislation. It is recommended that this proposal be enacted by the Congress.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

Section 1107(b) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (72 Stat. 798) authorizes the head of any Government department or other agency having jurisdiction over an airport owned or operated by the Government to provide for the sale to any aircraft of fuel, oil, equipment, mechanical service, and shelter if such action is, by reason of an emergency, necessary to the continuance of such aircraft on its course to the nearest airport operated by private enterprise. There is a need for legislation which will provide authority for carefully regulated sales in certain circumstances where such sales would be definitely advantageous to the Government, yet a clear case of emergency, as required by the present law, does not exist. To fill this need, the proposed amendment would revise section 1107(b) of the act to authorize such sales in circumstances which would benefit the Government, as well as in emergencies. While the military services wish to restrict reimbursable supply transactions of this kind to a minimum, there are a number of situations in which they would be clearly advantageous to the Government. For example, some of our overseas airbases, particularly those in remote island and polar areas, are regular points or alternates for civil air routes important to our national defense. Others may become such points in the future as new routes are developed. Operations to those points would seldom qualify as "emergencies" within the meaning of that term in the present law; nor would operational considerations permit confining sales to amounts necessary to get to the nearest commercial source, as is likewise required under existing law. The proposed change would both clear up these points for present civil use of our bases and facilitate development of future routes of importance to our national defense.

The proposed legislation would also clarify the authority for sales to air carriers operating under contract with the U.S. Government. A substantial portion of the air transportation requirements of the Government are now met by contract operations. All their needs for logistical support from the Government, particularly at remote corners of the globe, frequently cannot be predicted at the time the contract is drafted.

Still another advantage of the proposed legislation would be simplification of authority and procedures for servicing aircraft from allied countries at U.S. Air Force bases while on joint air exercises and training flights. Although section 106 of the Mutual Security Act authorizes such sales, the statutory requirements, procedures, and regulations controlling mutual security transactions, while appropriate for occasional sales of costly equipment, are extremely inefficient and uneconomical if applied to recurring transactions such as routine fuel and related sales.

Reciprocal treatment for our own aircraft would be assured by amending the provisions of section 1107(b) of the Federal Aviation Act to make them applicable to aircraft owned by, or registered in, any friendly foreign nation which authorizes comparable assistance to aircraft owned by, or registered in, the United States.

To insure that Government agencies do not compete with commercial enterprise with respect to sales of the kind discussed and to facilitate the establishment of commercial supply sources where the demand would support them, a new subsection "(d)" is proposed for section 1107 of the act. The new subsection "(d)" would prohibit sales under section 1107(b) of the items listed therein, if they are reasonably available from commercial sources. Further, wherever the present or anticipated source would support such a source, the Department having jurisdiction over the facility would be directed to encourage the establishment of a commercial source, if the circumstances at the facility permit.

There are a number of foreign bases jointly occupied by the United States and host government agencies or airlines. This is particularly true in Japan, where most of the former Japanese airfields have been under U.S. jurisdiction and operations. With the growth of civil air operations at such bases, situations have arisen in which the supply function would not be assumed by commercial concerns unless certain U.S.-controlled pipelines and storage facilities could be utilized where space limitations and other considerations foreclose construction of duplicate facilities. In such circumstances the United States may relieve a burden on its own supplies by permitting, where feasible, joint use of certain facilities. Careful safeguards have been provided in the proposed legislation to prevent any additional cost to the U.S. Government or unwarranted profit to a commercial enterprise in such circumstances.

Occasions arise when it would be advantageous to the Government to allow commercial oil companies to operate Government petroleum storage and dispensing facilities and to supply Government-owned fuel through these facilities to their commercial accounts, repaying the Government either in cash or by reimbursement-in-kind. Such situations occur in locations where stores of Government-owned mobilization reserve fuel stocks must be maintained, but where normal consumption does not assure the required freshening of stocks. Rotation of such fuel for quality control purposes, normally required at considerable expense to the Government, could be accomplished in some instances at no cost to the Government under the proposed amendment. Further, there are cases in which it is economically preferable for the Government to accept commercially-owned fuel at one location and repay it by replacement-in-kind at another location, in order to save the Government transportation costs. Legislative authority to enter into such arrangements is included in the attached draft by the proposed new subsection "(e)" of section 1107 of the act.

The provisions of existing section 1107(b) of the act, relative to terms of such sales of fuels, equipment, and other services, and disposition of the proceeds therefrom, would be revised and incorporated into proposed new subsections "(c)" and "(g)" of section 1107.

COST AND BUDGET DATA

Enactment of this proposed legislation would result in no increased cost to the Government and in fact should result in savings where the cost of rotating and transferring fuel can be eliminated as outlined above.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD A. QUARLES,
Deputy.

AUTHORIZING COAST GUARD TO SELL CERTAIN UTILITIES

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Coast Guard to sell certain utilities. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, requesting the proposed legislation, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 577) to amend title 10, United States Code, section 2481, to authorize the U.S. Coast Guard to sell certain utilities in the immediate vicinity of a Coast Guard activity not available from local sources, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 7, 1959.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to amend title 10, United States Code, section 2481, to authorize the U.S. Coast Guard to sell certain utilities in the immediate vicinity of a Coast Guard activity not available from local sources.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to provide legislative authority for the Coast Guard to sell utilities and services to the same extent and under the same conditions as the military departments. With this authority existing utilities and water services in many instances would be extended to isolated inhabitants, in many cases servicemen, whose close association with the Coast Guard is highly desirable.

It would be appreciated if you would lay the proposed bill before the Senate. A similar proposed bill has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Bills identical to that proposed herein were introduced during the 2d session of the 85th Congress as H.R. 12328 and S. 3737 but were not acted upon by the Congress.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Very truly yours,

A. GILMORE FLUES,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

NATIONAL FOOD ALLOTMENT ACT

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill providing for a food allotment plan to safeguard and improve the health of the American people. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement which I have prepared on that subject, which I shall not take the time to read.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR AIKEN

Today I have introduced an important measure which I have placed before the Senate in every Congress since 1943.

It is a proposal for a food allotment plan to safeguard and improve the health of the American people, to improve farm income through an expansion of wholesale and retail markets, and to eliminate as far as possible Government competition with private industry in the distribution of food to low-income people.

I consider this proposal to be an important step in eliminating one of the major problems facing our people today.

This is the problem of underfed people and underpaid farmers in a Nation which is presently enjoying unprecedented prosperity.

I am glad to have joining with me again in the sponsorship of this measure the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

At the present time, we have a relief program in this country which is doling out surplus food to millions of Americans on a rather socialistic basis.

As of October 1958, 5½ million people in family units were certified as eligible to receive surplus foods, and 4,770,000 people actually received such food free of charge.

The number is probably even greater today.

This food is donated by the Government, processing is paid for by the Government, transportation costs are paid for by the Government, and the distributing is done by Government officials.

Whenever private industry is allowed to enter into the distribution, it does so only under contract with the Government.

No wholesale or retail food dealer gets a nickel's worth of business from the distribution of this free food to almost 5 million people.

It should be obvious that an allotment program such as provided for in this bill is far less socialistic than the present program of Federal distribution of free food.

Today, there are some 26 million people in this country with incomes so low that they cannot afford to purchase foods necessary to a healthy existence.

This food allotment program, which is not the old food-stamp plan, contemplates getting away from direct distribution of food by Government as was done under the old stamp plan.

The food allotment plan would work this way:

First, the level of nutrition needed to keep an average person healthy is scientifically determined and then translated into actual amounts of lower cost foods.

Then, the value of the low-cost adequate diet is determined at current retail food prices.

Finally, the buying power of families that are unable to afford the low-cost adequate diet is supplemented by additional purchases made possible by the issuance of food coupons.

All foods would be bought through normal trade channels on a purely voluntary basis.

The family would be required to furnish such information about its income as might be required to show its eligibility before being admitted to the program by the local administrative agency.

Wholesale and retail merchants would be registered to accept coupons in exchange for food.

Retailers and wholesalers would receive payments for the coupons through duly designated banks.

Funds derived from the sale of coupons would be deposited to the credit of any appropriation authorized to carry out the program.

It is estimated that the people who would benefit from the food allotment program would consume up to 30 percent more of meats, dairy products, eggs and poultry, citrus fruits, and vegetables.

This program would increase the market for food grains.

It would mean more business for transportation companies, processors, handlers, merchants, and banks.

The cost would be what the Congress chooses to make it although it would compare favorably with the cost of the several programs now operating in attempts to control surpluses in a less democratic manner.

The food allotment program would be an effective antidepression preventive working effectively to forestall unemployment.

It is the hope of the sponsors of the food allotment program that this year serious consideration will be given to this important legislation.

No one should be deluded by any false cries of socialism.

We are trying to get away from the Government dole any paternalism.

This is a program which would work through private channels to make health giving foods available to people living on small, fixed incomes, at prices within their reach—such people as those who are recipients of old age assistance and survivors insurance, dependent children, permanently disabled persons, blind persons, general assistance beneficiaries, persons living in broken homes, and those living on inadequate pensions or retirement funds.

In our land of unparalleled plenty, these people are truly the forgotten people.

This year, we can do nothing more important than to remember those whose incomes remain the same at a time when prices and wages are rising rapidly on all sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 585) to safeguard the health, efficiency, and morale of the American people; to provide for improved nutrition through a more effective distribution of food supplies through a food-allotment program; to assist in maintaining fair prices and incomes to farmers by providing adequate outlets for agricultural products; to prevent burdening and obstructing channels of interstate commerce; to promote the full use of agricultural resources; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. AIKEN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

DEPARTMENT OF SCIENCE

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to establish a U.S. Department of Science and to prescribe the functions thereof. This is the same as Senate bill 3180, which I introduced in the last session.

It is my belief that, as time passes, the indications become clearer and clearer that we shall never go ahead as we should in connection with matters relating to science until we have some overall coordination of our efforts; and this bill is for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 586) to establish a U.S. Department of Science and to prescribe the functions thereof, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Aeronautics and Space Sciences.

GATHERING, EVALUATION, AND DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the gathering, evaluation, and dissemination of information, and for the formulation of plans, which is intended to aid in the maintenance of a high level of prosperity in the United States. This bill is identical to H.R. 800, which was introduced in the House by Representative ELMER J. HOLLAND of the 30th Congressional District of Pennsylvania on January 7, 1959.

This bill would set up a commission which would consist of nine members, drawing its membership from industry, labor, and other fields of endeavor.

The overall or guiding function of the Commission to make plans for now and in the future to maintain continuing prosperity.

One obvious merit that this Commission would have would be that it would provide the President with firsthand data and experience from outstanding citizens in their respective fields.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 589) to provide for the gathering, evaluation, dissemination of information, and for the formulation of plans, which will aid in the maintenance of a high level of prosperity in the United States, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

FREE MARKETING OF GOLD

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators BIBLE, BARTLETT, and GRUENING, I introduce, for appropriate reference, what I consider to be one of the most important bills that will come before this session of the Congress.

This bill is short, less than 100 words in length, and is made up of two sections. Section 1 would permit the free marketing and ownership of gold—a legal right every American should have—and section 2 would direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $70 per fine ounce for all gold domestically mined and tendered to the Treasury Department subsequent to enactment of the bill.

Throughout recorded history, the most prosperous and the most powerful nations have been those nations whose monetary systems were based upon gold and silver and whose reserves of these metals were adequate to give complete integrity to their paper money in all the marts of the world. In recent months tremendous drains have been reported, month by month, on the gold reserves and stocks of this Government stored at Fort Knox, and this trend can be expected to continue as the soft currencies of numerous European countries are stiffened into hard money in the growing competition for foreign trade.

Soviet Russia and the so-called Soviet bloc are becoming increasingly active in world trade circles, as is evidenced by the presence at this moment in this country of Russia's No. 1 international salesman and by recurring hints that Russia is about to back her ruble with gold.

In the days ahead this Nation will need more gold, and the best way to obtain that gold is to make it possible for the American gold mining industry to increase its output. Last year our domestic gold output reached the lowest point since 1946, a mere $60 million worth, a drop of about 5 percent from the production of 1957.

If this Nation is to hold its own in foreign trade, it must have more adequate reserves of gold, and section 2 of the bill I am now introducing will provide in the years ahead gold stocks from our own domestic mines necessary to accomplish that purpose. In addition, it will provide a beneficial economic stimulus that will be felt in every mining area of this Nation.

Mr. President, so that other Senators who may wish to cosponsor this bill may have an opportunity to do so, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk for 1 week before printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, which is very short, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 590) to permit the free marketing of gold, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. GRUENING), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or executive order or regulation to the contrary, gold may be acquired, purchased, sold, melted or treated, held in custody, transported, or earmarked by any person or Government instrumentality without penalty or restriction.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay $70 per fine ounce for all gold domestically mined and tendered to the Treasury subsequent to the enactment of this Act.

PROHIBITION OF FEES TO VIEW TELECASTS IN PRIVATE HOMES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to prohibit the charging of a fee to view telecasts in private homes. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by the Senator from North Dakota relating to the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 591) to prohibit the charging of a fee to view telecasts in private homes, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The statement presented by Mr. DIRKSEN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LANGER

Last year I introduced Senate bill 2934, to prohibit the charging of a fee to view telecasts in private homes.

This bill was introduced after I had made a study into the problem of the impact of pay television on the viewing public of America. Bartlesville, Okla., was one of the few areas that made a test of a form of pay television and after circularizing some 8,000 homeowners in the Bartlesville area, I received 1,930 responses not in favor of pay television and only 163 in favor of pay-as-you-see television.

There were several other surveys made on the desires of the public for pay television and I shall note them for the RECORD:

From Broadcasting magazine, November 4, 1957, page 60:

"And, at the FCC, mailbags full of printed post cards were being received at the instigation of Michigan State Senator Harold M. Ryan. Mr. Ryan began a one-man crusade against pay TV 3 weeks ago in Detroit (Government, Oct. 21).

"As of Friday, the FCC had received almost 3,500 cards against toll TV. They were being sent over from the White House in mailbag loads. The cards are addressed: 'Federal Communications Commission, care of the White House, Washington 25, D.C.'"

From Broadcasting magazine, November 11, 1957, pages 34 and 39:

"Toll TV proponents who clamor for the public to be the judge in the subscription television hassle would do well to curb such confidence—at least in the Salinas-Monterey and San Luis Obispo areas of California.

"The reason: The public was asked there and only 4 people voted for pay TV while 5,002 were recorded as opposing the fee system.

"John C. Cohan, principal owner of KSBW-TV, Salinas-Monterey, and coowner of KSBY-TV, San Luis Obispo, last week explained that the project to get a pulse beat of the communities was undertaken as the result of numerous requests to the stations for an explanation of toll TV. * * *

"Other antitoll TV repercussions set in, according to Mr. Cohan, who said people began handing out petitions to be signed in Seaside, Watsonville, Pacific Grove, Greenfield, and other neighboring communities; local grocers put petitions on walls to be signed by customers, and organizations, such as the Veterans of Foreign Wars of King City, passed resolutions against pay TV."

I may point out that during the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee hearings on S. 4070, a bill to give certain exemptions to professional team sports from the antitrust laws, I introduced an amendment to that bill which reads as follows:

"On page 3, line 6, immediately after the period, insert the following new sentence: 'No person conducting or engaging in any such organized professional team sport shall enter into or become a party to any contract, agreement, or other arrangement resulting directly or indirectly in the imposition upon the public by any person of any requirement for the payment of any toll, fee, subscription, or other charge for the privilege of viewing, on television receiving sets in private residences, any organized professional team contest of any such sport.'"

The purpose of this amendment would be to prohibit the San Francisco Giants and the Los Angeles Dodgers from contracting to telecast their baseball games from their respective home playing fields and requiring the viewing public to pay a specific charge and thereby deprive the people from the great western part of the country the privilege of viewing baseball free on television as other citizens in the country do. It seems ironical that the people of the great West have waited so many years for major league baseball and then have to view it on television only by having to pay for that privilege.

I noted with great interest that the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee recently released a report in which they asked the Federal Communications Commission to examine its jurisdiction over pay television and if they feel that they do not have such jurisdiction then Congress should take action to protect the American public from pay-as-you-see television.

Attached is a letter that I directed to all U.S. Senators and Representatives explaining my views on introducing S. 2934 in the 85th Congress. Also the radio broadcast by sports commentator Bill Stern. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

COPY OF LETTER TO ALL UNITED STATES SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES

DECEMBER 5, 1957.

HONORABLE XX,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ———: The people of my State have become very much alarmed that "pay as you see" television may be installed and that if they wish to see certain features, such as the world series, ceremonials, musicals, shows, etc., they will be required to pay a monthly fee or a stipulated price per program. One group states it will cost a family as much as $3.50 per day or $70 per month.

Subscription television has already been given a trial run in Bartlesville, Okla., and I am informed that the cost to viewers was $7.50 per month.

This matter may not have been brought to your attention by the people of your State, but because of the anxiety expressed by my constituents, I am bringing it to your attention for such action as you may deem proper. I, personally, plan to introduce the enclosed bill in January, and if you approve of the objectives contained therein, you may wish to sponsor similar legislation in the House.

With every good wish, I am,
Sincerely,

WILLIAM LANGER,
U.S. Senator.

BROADCAST BY SPORTS SPECIALIST BILL STERN

A bitter fight is being waged behind the scenes in baseball to stop Walter O'Malley from putting his Dodgers on pay TV next year.

Nowhere in the list of Dodger officials does the name Matty Fox appear, but he is probably the most powerful man in the organization. It is Mathew Fox who is the real reason the Dodgers moved to California. He is the man behind pay TV and holds a contract for the exclusive for the telecasting rights to the Dodger games next year. The figures being talked about are stupendous. While O'Malley in his usual manner of telling as little as possible has never revealed exactly what the Dodgers will get from pay TV, the Giants have revealed that in the next 10 years they will get the unbelievable sum of about $37 million if all goes well. But O'Malley? He only chuckles and says that's his business.

But is it merely O'Malley's business? There are a lot of people in Los Angeles who don't think so. They think they have some interest in what happens to the team. Weren't they told by O'Malley when he was trying to woo them that when he brought the team west, that the games would be on free TV? They most certainly were, but that was only one of the promises that O'Malley broke. Wasn't he going to have the Dodgers in contention? Why, according to O'Malley, this team would be a great credit to Los Angeles as it fought for the pennant. What pennant? The Dodgers were lucky they stayed out of last place.

And how about O'Malley's land grab? In return for some 300 acres in Chavez Ravine, 1 mile adjacent to downtown Los Angeles, O'Malley would give the city of Los Angeles a new stadium, a team they could be proud of, a new playground. Sounds fair, but as usual the real truth was hidden. What O'Malley really meant was that he would bring his team to the west coast if they would deed to him property worth about 10 times what he gave up, that he would build a $300,000 city playground if the city would spend about $2 million building roads to and leveling off O'Malley's property.

But lest you feel sorry for Walter now that his land grab has failed, the "deal" that was forced on him by the Coliseum because he was helpless and "had to" have that stadium temporarily, will only net O'Malley about a $4 million profit this year!

But behind the scenes, some baseball people are trying desperately to stop O'Malley from swinging over to pay TV this year. Sure he'll make more millions, but what about the poor baseball fans who bought sets in good faith never thinking that these sets would be useless once O'Malley brought his team to California.

No, the name of Matty Fox doesn't appear on any Dodger roster, nor is he a club official, but he's the important man in the Dodgers future. He brought them to the promised land. Little matter that now they are in that land, most of the promises aren't being kept.

REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to repeal all Federal excise taxes. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by the Senator from North Dakota, relating to the bill, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 592) to repeal all Federal retailers excise taxes, certain manufacturers excise taxes, and the excise taxes on facilities and services, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The statement presented by Mr. DIRKSEN is as follows:

I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to repeal all Federal retailer excise taxes, certain manufacturers' excise taxes, and the excise taxes on facilities and services.

I have introduced this bill previously and unfortunately the Congress of the United States has not seen fit to repeal these excise taxes which were enacted into law during World War II and were definitely labeled as wartime excise taxes to aid us in the defense of our Nation and carry on a successful conclusion of World War II.

My stand on this subject of repealing excise taxes is well known and I have spoken on the floor from time to time in favor of such repeal. I hope that this Congress will look favorably on this bill.

ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE ACT

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to be known as "The Federal Administrative Practice Act of 1959."

I introduce this bill at the request of the American Bar Association. It is substantially identical to the one I introduced in the 85th Congress which was identified as S. 932.

When S. 932 was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I had the privilege of being appointed chairman of a special subcommittee to consider the bill. All Government departments and agencies were written and their views respecting the bill requested. Answers were received from all of them. A summary and compilation of these views was prepared and printed as a committee print.

The bill is far reaching and encompasses many aspects of administrative practice. Therefore, consideration should be and has been deliberate. Our study of the bill has not progressed far enough for me to commit myself to support all of its terms; however, I believe Congress should continue its work in this area and enact legislation where it is found necessary. The American Bar Association continues to rate this bill as top priority in its legislative program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks a brief summary of the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 600) to establish an Office of Federal Administrative Practice; to provide for the appointment and administration of a corps of hearing commissioners; to provide for admission to and control of practice; to establish a Legal Career Service for improvement of legal services in Government; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself and Mr. WILEY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The analysis presented by Mr. HENNINGS is as follows:

THE FEDERAL ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE ACT OF 1959—TITLE-BY-TITLE ANALYSIS

This bill would provide for the improvement of administrative procedures and practice by establishing an Office of Federal Administrative Practice, an independent agency, which would initiate centralized coordination of procedure and practice matters; administer an improved hearing commissioner program; establish a new Legal Career System for Government legal services and provide for the admission and control of practice and representation of persons in the conduct of proceedings or matters before the various Federal agencies.

The Office of Federal Administrative Practice, under title I, would be headed by a director and deputy director appointed by the President, with consent of the Senate, for terms of 10 years and 5 years, respectively. The office would have three major divisions administered by assistant directors; namely, Division of Administrative Procedure, Division of Hearing Commissioners and Divison of Government Practice. The Director would report directly to the Congress on any matter for improving the effectiveness and efficiency of Government operations in the area of procedures and practice. The Office mainly would operate at interagency level and would provide machinery for the coordination and direction of procedures and practice on matters of concern horizontally and uniformly among the agencies. It would perform needed and indispensable service to citizens, concerns and industries in their day-to-day dealings with agencies of the Government.

Title II would provide new and improved measures for the recruitment, appointment, and administration of hearing commissioners. Trial examiners now serving would be given hearing commissioner status and continued duty with the agencies where they now serve.

Title III would establish for the first time a legal career service for civilian lawyers in Government service and promote the efficiency of Government legal services. The present system is haphazard and confused. The proposed bill would facilitate the recruitment, employment, and retention of lawyers of outstanding character and ability in the legal career service, and assure the performance of the legal work of the Government in accordance with high professional standards.

Title IV assures the right of persons to representation in matters or proceedings before Government agencies. It provides for both attorney practice and lay representation and imposes standards of conduct for both in the handling of matters before Government agencies. The bill would assist attorneys throughout the country by providing for centralized admission to practice. Detailed provisions are made for disciplinary proceedings and control of unprofessional conduct.

The bill is almost entirely new legislation. It provides the basis for an orderly improvement of procedures and practice of far-reaching importance to the Federal agencies, to the Congress, and to all citizens having matters before the Federal agencies. The bill provides a new approach to proposals which have been of increasing interest to the Congress and to the public for more than a decade; as to most of the provisions, there is general recognition of the need for legislation of some sort.

STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] be added as a cosponsor to the Hawaii statehood bill, S. 50. On January 9, I had the honor, as chairman of the Interior Committee, of introducing S. 50 for myself and 53 cosponsors.

On their behalf and my own, I wish to welcome the Senator from Iowa to the ranks of Senators, now 55 strong, who are signers of the Hawaii statehood bill. And I will renew my assurances for prompt action on it by the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 94) to provide for Government contribution toward personal health service benefits for civilian officers and employees in the United States service and their dependents, to authorize payroll deductions for participants, and for other purposes, introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], on January 12, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BOMBING OF HOMES, CHURCHES, SCHOOLS, ETC.—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 188) to prohibit certain acts involving the importation, transportation, possession, or use of explosives, the next time it is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 17, 1959, the name of Mr. ALLOTT was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 456) to amend part III of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Senators KEATING, CASE of New Jersey, COOPER, and SCOTT), on January 17, 1959.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR BILLS TO LIE ON THE DESK

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, last Saturday I introduced two bills which were intended to provide emergency assistance to persons out of work in the depressed areas of our country. Those bills were numbered S. 489 and S. 423.

I ask unanimous consent that they may lie upon the table through the next meeting of the Senate, in order to give to other Members of the Senate who desire to cosponsor the bills, an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bills will lie on the table as requested.

PRESIDENTIAL ITEM VETO POWER—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on Friday, January 9, 1959, I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 1, to give the President item veto powers over appropriation bills and bills authorizing direct borrowings from the Treasury.

Joining me in sponsorship of the resolution at that time were the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the distinguished senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS].

My colleague, the able junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], and the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] have advised me that they favor the purposes of the concurrent resolution and wish to be listed as sponsors of it. Likewise, the distinguished junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] desires to be associated with us as a cosponsor of the resolution. Of course, I am delighted to have them join with me.

Accordingly, I ask unanimous consent that the names of these Senators may be added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 1 when it is next printed and reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT ON STATUS OF COLORADO RIVER STORAGE PROJECT AND PARTICIPATING PROJECTS (S. DOC. NO. 8)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, under date of December 30, 1958, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Fred G. Aandahl, transmitted to the President of the Senate the Second Annual Report on the Status of the Colorado River Storage Project and Participating Projects, as required by section 6 of the authorizing act of April 11, 1956 (70 Stat. 105). I request unanimous consent that the letter and accompanying report be printed as a Senate document, together with my statement to the Senate today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, the first annual report of the Secretary, as required by the authorizing act, is printed as Senate Document No. 77, 85th Congress, 2d session. It contained a statement on hydrologic bases for financial studies, Colorado River storage project.

A supplement to Senate Document No. 77 was printed as Senate Document No. 96 as presented by the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona on May 1, 1958. Senate Document No. 96 is made up of a statement of the Arizona Interstate Stream Commission and the Arizona Power Authority in regard to the operation of Glen Canyon Reservoir together with a letter from the Governor of Arizona.

As of June 30, 1958, the report shows the total assets of the Colorado River storage project amounted to $63,346,175. This amount is made up principally of $48,742,000 of direct congressional appropriations, largely for the construction of Glen Canyon Dam and Reservoir, contributions by States and other organizations, contractors' earnings and transfers from the Bureau of Public Roads.

While Glen Canyon Dam is the key structure of the project as a revenue producer from power, other facilities are essential to balance the development of the Upper Colorado River Basin.

To present the current progress of the Colorado River storage project, it is noted that for fiscal year 1959, the funds appropriated by Congress for the Colorado River storage project totaled $68,035,335. Of this amount, $47,591,743 was allotted to Glen Canyon Dam construction; $10,228,335 to Flaming Gorge Dam; and $7,067,057 to initiate construction of Navajo Dam in my own State of New Mexico. In addition, $249,003 was made available for transmission lines, $1,026,000 to start construction of the Paonia participating project in Colorado, and $1,035,000 for the Vernal unit, Central Utah project in Utah.

In the Upper Colorado River Basin, we are looking forward to a speedup in the construction of the storage and power dams under way and the participating irrigation units.

However, the President's budget for fiscal year 1960 indicates a slowdown in actual construction of the three major power or storage dams by estimating a limit for expenditures for construction during the fiscal year. Appropriations or budget estimates for the Colorado River storage project total $78,600,000. Of this amount, Navajo Dam is allotted $9,900,000; Glen Canyon Dam, $48,500,000; Flaming Gorge, $13,400,000; transmission lines, $746,000; advance planning, $845,000; Paonia unit, $3,200,000; and Vernal unit, $1,900,000.

The budget message, however, indicates the administration anticipates total expenditures of about $65 million. This would result in a built-in carryover for the Colorado River storage project, should the Congress follow the budget proposal. We hope the hearings on the budget will develop whether the proposals represent an economical rate of construction expenditures for the Colorado River storage project.

The Congress, through the Appropriations Committees, will have an opportunity to pass on the soundness of the budgetary presentation before the end of the current session. The President's budget, when it comes to the Congress next week, will give an indication of the administration's recognition of the importance of this great water resource development.

In New Mexico, in order to put water to be stored in Navajo Dam to work, early authorization of the Navajo Indian irrigation unit is being sought along with the first stage of the San Juan-Chama diversion as provided in S. 3648, passed by the Senate on August 15, 1958. The San Juan-Chama diversion will aid in regulation of the Rio Grande River to provide additional municipal water supplies for New Mexico cities like Albuquerque and Farmington.

The Navajo irrigation-San Juan-Chama authorization bill has been reintroduced as S. 72 by me, together with my colleague, the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. Early hearings are anticipated on this measure and, with our colleagues in the House, Representatives MONTOYA and MORRIS, we shall press for prompt enactment at this session.

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Address entitled "A Trend and a Challenge," delivered by Senator HOLLAND before American Farm Bureau Federation, Boston, Mass., December 10, 1958; and editorial entitled "A Statesman From the Deep South," published in the Oklahoma City Times of December 23, 1958.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate received today from the President of the United States the following nominations:

Henry A. Byroade, of Indiana, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Afghanistan;

Sheldon T. Mills, of Oregon, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan; and William C. Trimble, of Maryland, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Kingdom of Cambodia, vice Carl W. Strom.

Notice is given that the Committee on Foreign Relations, at the expiration of 6 days, in accordance with the committee rule, will give consideration to these nominations.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF NORMAN P. MASON TO BE HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as in executive session, while Members of the Senate are on the floor I should like to call their attention to the fact that there is at the desk the nomination of Mr. Norman P. Mason, of Massachusetts, to be Housing and Home Finance Administrator. The President has sent the nomination to the Senate, the Committee on Banking and Currency has considered it, and has reported it favorably to the Senate. I hope that the Senate will act on it today, so that a Housing and Home Finance Administrator will be in office when the housing hearings begin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Norman P. Mason to be Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination?

There being no objection, the Senate as in executive session, proceeded to consider the nomination.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, although the minority members of the Committee on Banking and Currency had not yet been formally appointed, when the nomination was considered, I am confident, on the basis of the record of Mr. Mason's service in the Housing and Home Finance Agency, that his nomination will meet with very general approval. I believe the matter has been checked with all members of the Committee on Banking and Currency presently serving on the committee.

Mr. BUSH. That is correct, so far as the minority and the majority Members are concerned.

Mr. FREAR. The nomination was unanimously reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Norman P. Mason to be Housing and Home Finance Administrator? [Putting the question.] The nomination is confirmed, and, without objection, the President will be notified.

NATIONAL JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT WEEK

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, authorizing the President to declare the week of January 25–31, 1959, as National Junior Achievement Week, and that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

I have asked for immediate consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 3 because of the necessity of prompt action by the Congress before National Junior Achievement Week begins on January 25. I may say that this action has the approval of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. EASTLAND] and of the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Federal Charters, Holidays, and Celebrations [Mr. O'MAHONEY.] Over the past few years the Congress has consistently adopted the same resolution, Mr. President.

The resolution calls on the President to declare the week of January 25–31, 1959, as National Junior Achievement Week, in recognition of the great work being done by junior achievement companies for American youth.

I hope the Senate will speedily approve this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the concurrent resolution as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 25, 1959, through January 31, 1959, as National Junior Achievement Week and urging all citizens of our country to salute the activities of Junior Achievers and their volunteer adult advisers through appropriate ceremonies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, normally the resolution would be referred to committee. However, since the committees are not functioning, and since this matter has been so acceptable, and also in view of the fact that such widespread interest has been manifested in the subject, speedy action is necessary if we are to carry out the purpose of the resolution in declaring the week starting on January 25 as Junior Achievement Week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the discharge of the committee and the consideration of the resolution by the Senate? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 3) was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIRST INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I do not wish to utilize any more time in the morning hour. However, today marks the sixth anniversary of the President of the United States taking over the office of Chief Executive. When the morning hour has been concluded I shall pay a tribute to the President. I am confident that my colleagues will wish to join me in it. We shall perhaps spend an hour in appropriately testifying to our feelings toward the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, what is the Senator's request?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is not a request. I am serving notice that we expect to indulge in some tributes to the President of the United States as soon as the morning hour is over.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is very agreeable to the majority leader. I expect to join the Senator.

SYMINGTON'S RECORD PRAISED

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon the Washington Star carried a very timely and significant article captioned "SYMINGTON'S 'Failure.'" The editorial reads as follows:

SYMINGTON'S "FAILURE"

The fine art of distorting the truth is so highly developed and so diligently practiced in this Capital City that one tends to become a bit bored with it all. Most of these efforts evoke little more than a ho-hum reaction. But the latest Republican blast against Senator STUART SYMINGTON is a thing apart. It soars to such heights of massive misrepresentation as to compel a sort of grudging, though perverse, admiration.

This masterpiece of deceit appears in something called "Battle Line," published by the Republican National Committee. Its thesis is that Senator SYMINGTON was a "failure" when he served as Secretary of the Air Force from 1947 to 1950, a conclusion which is "documented" by a fantastic assortment of quotations lifted out of context and by utterly irrelevant statistics. The obvious purpose of this partisan shot is to discredit the Missouri Democrat as a defense expert and to downgrade him as a prospective Democratic presidential nominee in 1960. If Mr. SYMINGTON was a dud as Secretary of the Air Force in the late forties, argues Battle Line, why take him seriously now as a critic of the current defense effort?

It is no part of our purpose to plead the case for Senator SYMINGTON as a Democratic presidential aspirant or as a competent critic of the 1959 defense program. This is a political matter in which there is plenty of room for difference of opinion. It is simply not true, however, that Mr. SYMINGTON was a failure as Secretary of the Air Force, and somebody should say so. The real truth is, and the record proves it, that Mr. SYMINGTON, in the bleak years from 1947 to 1950, had the courage to stand up and fight for adequate air power for the United States. He did this in the face of the popular but gravely harmful defense economy program dictated by President Truman and cheerfully accepted by most of the country. He did it knowing that he was risking his own career in Government, and we cannot recall the name of even one Republican politician who stood up and fought with him.

This is not to say that the Symington efforts met with any great success. He was able to persuade Congress to appropriate funds for a somewhat stronger Air Force, but this came to nothing when Mr. Truman impounded the money. The point is, however, that Mr. SYMINGTON was fighting for more air power before, and not after, the Korean war revealed to everyone how weak we really were.

The truth-twisters who drafted this phony Battle Line report for the G.O.P ought to go back and read the report of Air Secretary SYMINGTON in January 1949—a year and a half before the Korean war. This report urged the "vital necessity" of strengthening our air arm before war broke, and warned that this country had "none too much time to provide itself with the means of its own protection."

These were not the words of a man who was a failure as Secretary of the Air Force. And we hope that this disingenuous Republican effort to take advantage of short memories will come to nothing.

Mr. President, ever since I became a Member of Congress—some 35 years ago—I have served on committees which had some jurisdiction over our Armed Forces. During all the time I was a Member of the House of Representatives, I served on the old Committee on Military Affairs; in fact, through seniority I became chairman of that important committee. Since coming to the Senate, I have served on the old Committee on Military Affairs; and when that committee was merged with the Committee on Naval Affairs to become the Committee on Armed Services, I became a member of the Committee on Armed Services.

In 1949 I left the Committee on Armed Services and became a member of the Committee on Appropriations and also a member of the Subcommittee on Armed Services Appropriations.

So, during my entire 35 years in Congress, I have served on committees which have had insight into and intimate contact with the needs, the operations, and the future of our Armed Forces.

Yesterday I wrote to Senator SYMINGTON a letter in which, among other things, I said:

MY DEAR STUART: Strange things occur, but I never thought I'd see the day when STUART SYMINGTON would be charged with not driving for more effective air power; or that a statement of mine would be used in an effort to establish such a ridiculous charge.

Those of us who have been around Washington for the last 15 years know that, certainly as much as any man, during both Democratic and Republican administrations, STUART SYMINGTON has done his everlasting best to make this country strong in the air.

For anybody to assert or imply otherwise displays ignorance of the truth, or a desire to twist the truth.

Mr. President, in my long service in Congress, and as a result of my intimate insight into our Armed Forces, I know of no man who has done as much, who has worked as laboriously, or who has fought as hard to build our Air Force and to build the strength of America in the air as has STUART SYMINGTON. I pay tribute to him today as the builder of America's air power, as the man who has fought the greatest battles, the greatest number of battles, and the most effective battles for the strength of America in the air.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds Senators that the Senate is still in the morning hour.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the able Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. HILL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the distinguished senior Senator very much for his kind words with respect to this attack on me by the Republican National Committee. There is no one in the Senate I would rather have speak for me in this matter than LISTER HILL, not only because of his knowledge of the subject, but also because of what we and the American people think of his integrity and character.

I am very grateful also to the distinguished majority leader for his kind statement Saturday with respect to this attack on me. It was a gracious thing for him to do, based on his great knowledge of, and experience in, the subject of air power.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I am very glad the distinguished Senator from Alabama saw fit to read into the RECORD the editorial concerning Senator SYMINGTON, which was published in the Washington Evening Star, and which I have with me. I had intended to ask that it be printed in the RECORD had not the Senator from Alabama done so.

I associate myself with the remarks which the distinguished Senator from Alabama has made concerning my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON].

NOMINATION OF ROGER W. JONES AS CHAIRMAN OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "This Is a Bureaucrat," written by Katharine Hamill, and published in Fortune magazine for November 1953. The article concerns Mr. Roger W. Jones, who recently was nominated to be Chairman of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Jones is a distinguished citizen of my State. He has been recognized for his excellence as a civil servant. I have applauded and again applaud the nomination of Mr. Jones to be Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. The article published in Fortune magazine is a most excellent description of Mr. Jones' background.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS IS A BUREAUCRAT

(By Katharine Hamill)

"President Eisenhower today signed 20 bills into law. * * * The legislation was flown from Washington and President Eisenhower penned his signature to them shortly after he arrived at his office at 8 a.m., mountain standard time." (Associated Press dispatch from Denver, Aug. 12, 1953.)

The A.P. correspondent neglected to report that before penning his signature the President read through a letter attached to each bill, a letter summarizing the intention of the bill, its background and meaning, noting approval or objection from government agencies concerned with the legislation, and ending with a recommendation from the Budget Bureau for approval or veto. The letters were addressed to "My Dear Mr. President," signed "Respectfully yours, Roger W. Jones, Assistant Director for Legislative Reference."

Roger Warren Jones is a bureaucrat, a "paper pusher," a civil servant. Like most of the other 234,000 civilian employees in Washington, he is almost unknown to the public he has served faithfully and well for 20 years. His job in the Budget Bureau as Assistant Director for Legislative Reference is close to the top in civil service rating, but he is not unrepresentative of many others in the service who devote themselves to running the Government agencies and bureaus regardless of party politics and changes in administration. In his 20 years' service Jones, now 45, has risen from CAF (clerical, administrative, and fiscal) 5 with a salary of $2,000 a year to GS (general schedule) 17 with a salary of $13,400. He heads a staff of 22 legislative analysts, clerks, and stenographers. As one of the major subdivisions of the Budget Bureau, Legislative Reference is part of the Executive Offices of the President; Jones and his aid are members of the President's staff. Their functions are: to review and analyze all proposed legislation in order to determine its conformity with the President's program and its fiscal impact; to summarize and appraise all bills passed by Congress for the President's information before he takes action; to study all Executive orders and Proclamations with an eye to avoiding duplication and confusion. The office is, in short, a clearinghouse for legislation, before and after it is acted upon by Congress. "We try to determine," says Jones, "whether a measure is right or wrong, whether it fits in with the President's overall program, and whether we have the money to pay for it."

In a normal year Jones and his staff process some 5,500 requests and reports from Congress and the agencies, about 1,000 enrolled bills (legislation passed by Congress), and 100 Executive orders and proclamations. The processing is sometimes long-drawn and involved, with dozens of memoranda and letters written in formidable federalese. ("We have to use it to avoid misunderstanding," says Jones. "It's the common language of all government agencies.") A controversial bill may end up with an inch or more of superimposed paper, may have been the subject of days of conference and discussion as well as research and study. The peak load of work comes at the end of each session of Congress when the legislators push through a big last-minute batch of bills. At the close of the 1st session of the 83d Congress last August, for example, 207 bills (out of the session's total of 515) were passed in the last few days and had to be processed in Jones' office and rushed to President Eisenhower for action within the prescribed 10 days.

On the day before President Eisenhower left for Denver, Jones crossed the street from his office in the old State Department building to the White House with 72 bills and his 72 covering letters. He stood by with the President's Special Counsel, Bernard M. Shanley, for an hour and a half to answer questions while the President read and signed. "He's quick minded. He seems to know what's in the third paragraph before he finishes the second.") In the next week several packets were sent out to Denver by plane, and on the morning before the 10-day deadline Jones "ducked across the street" with the last 15 bills and turned them over to Shanley, who flew to Denver with them that afternoon.

JONES PROPOSES, IKE DISPOSES

The President, naturally, does not base his decision to approve or disapprove solely on the recommendation of Roger W. Jones, but the summaries and recommendations save his time and facilitate his decision. "It's a great satisfaction, of course, to know our staff work helps him," says Jones. In presenting routine bills to the President, Bernard Shanley groups them according to subject (veterans' benefits, etc.), and introduces them with a verbal report. Such bills are usually quickly signed. More complex or controversial legislation requires more consultation and may involve policy conferences at the White House, Jones has nothing to do with that. "We do the pro and con, the institutional review. We recommend, but the President and his staff make policy decisions."

When Congress adjourns, the immediate pressure that keeps Jones and his aids working hard and late is off, but there is pending legislation to be reviewed before Congress reconvenes and a constant stream of reports and queries from the agencies coming into the office. (All departments and agencies are required to submit to the Bureau their proposed legislation and reports on bills pending in Congress; congressional committees are not bound by law to consult the Bureau, but many do.) Jones and his staff report on 100 to 150 cases a week all through the year.

Usually about half the legislation enacted is composed of so-called private bills, acts setting aside a section of the Immigration Act to allow the entrance of specific persons, for instance, or acts awarding land patents or veterans' benefits. These are minor bills, but their merits must be closely studied in Jones' office. They must be checked with the Department of State and the Immigration Service or with the Department of Interior or the Veterans' Administration. Part of Jones' value is that he knows where to check, whom to call, what channels to move through. That is common bureaucratic knowledge, acquired by long years of service. More important values are Jones' administrative ability and his grasp of the whole legislative program. "We're right in the middle of the whole panorama of Government. It's a nerve-center operation."

Department and agency men are, necessarily, special pleaders for their own bills, and so are Congressmen. Jones and his staff must review legislation in relation to the general policies of the administration—regardless of the administration's politics or the President's personality. Jones, as he says, is a "liberal New England Republican," but that doesn't make him work any more conscientiously now than he did during the Democratic regime. In that respect he resembles the classic conception of a British civil servant. The President is an institution, Jones says; partisan politics don't affect the consideration of most legislation. Politics don't affect Jones' judgment of legislation. Neither have they affected his career in Government under Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, and Dwight Eisenhower.

PAPER PUSHER'S DAY

Jones' wide desk in the big, high-ceilinged office in Old State is usually heaped with papers and there are half a dozen blue telephone-call slips stuck on his desk pen when he gets to work at 9. He has been up since 6:30, had a leisurely breakfast, spent three-quarters of an hour reading the Washington Post, and listened to a local broadcast so that he can plan his day around any legislative crisis. He has driven in from Chevy Chase with his car-pool members (three other Budget Bureau officials) and talked business during the half-hour drive. The first 15 minutes in the office are spent assigning reports on bills to his lieutenants and putting the day's work in motion. There is a staff meeting (the Director and his assistants) at 9:15 every morning.

Staff problems are discussed at the meeting in Mr. Dodge's office at the other end of the long corridor (saves writing a lot of memos) and Jones gets back to his own room at 10. There are agency reports to read, proposed legislation, requests for information from congressional committees. There is a call from a department's legislative-liaison man, John Adams, of Defense, say, or Carl Sapp, of Agriculture, or John Carlock, of Treasury. One of the department's proposed bills may have come back from Jones' office with a note "not in accord with the President's program" and the liaison man wants to talk it over, to find out just where the difficulty lies so he can try to straighten it out in the department.

At 1 o'clock Jones goes downstairs to the executive cafeteria with two or three other Bureau staff members. Over lunch (a salad, maybe, iced tea, and a piece of pie—55 cents) the men talk over problems that have come up during the morning. After lunch, staff members come into Jones' office with the mail, questions are asked about specific reports, decisions made orally to save time. Later, Jones goes across the street to the White House with a briefcase full of papers for Mr. Shanley. Shanley may have questions on pending legislation or on some of the enrolled bills that have to be signed within the next few days. (Except at the rush time when Congress adjourns, Jones tries to send enrolled bills to the President 5 days before he must act upon them.) Another member of the White House staff may ask to see Jones on the wording of an Executive order. Jones may want to check a point of Presidential policy with one of the staff.

Back in his own office at 4:30, Jones finds a batch of calls from congressional committee members and agencies and he is on the telephone most of the rest of the day, except on Thursday, when there is a general top-staff meeting with the Director. Official quitting time is 5:30, "but we make no effort to keep it." Jones gets away between 6 and 6:30, half the time with a briefcase under his arm.

Jones is happy doing what he is doing, he feels qualified for the job, "although there are days when nothing falls into place and I scream inside," and he can't help knowing he does his job well. Not only Director Dodge and Deputy Director Rowland Hughes think highly of him ("Jones is excellent * * * outstanding"), but so do the department liaison men, White House officials, and his own staff.

There were times when congressional committeemen or department officials resented what they termed the "undue influence" of the Bureau of the Budget on legislation, but that is mostly in the past and most of them now rely on Jones and his staff.

"BLAMED BOTH WAYS"

Back in 1950, when called before the House Select Committee of Lobbying Activities, Jones testified that "The net effect of the legislative operation of the Budget Bureau has sometimes been construed as an interference with the direct relationship of executive agencies with the Congress, or with the committees of the Congress. On that, I should like to be very categorical.

"Every President of the United States, beginning with President Harding and coming straight down through to President Truman, has taken exactly the same position with respect to this Budget Bureau function—that it was not the function of the Budget Bureau in any way to censor the reports of agencies, or to tell them what they might or might not say to committees of Congress. The Bureau's sole role has been to indicate to the agencies the relationship of what they had to say, or the measure they were opposing or advocating, to the President's program. It is perfectly appropriate for the Chief Executive to require than in transmitting a report to the Congress the agency should clearly indicate what the relationship of the measure was to the President's program, or what the relationship of their views with respect to it were."

The CHAIRMAN. "Are you not apt to get blamed both ways, usually by the same group of people, for not having a unified policy on the one hand and having a strict disciplinary policy on the other?"

Mr. JONES. "That is correct, but that is pretty much the role of the Budget Bureau straight across the board, and we are, frankly, rather used to it."

Another annoyance that Jones is rather used to is the ridicule, sometimes vilification, of bureaucrats by the press and public. He is used to it, but still it makes him angry. That and the jibe "You never had to meet a payroll." He admits that it would be comparatively easy to do a routine job, to push the papers around to the proper departments and let it go at that. But he doesn't want to. In fact, being the kind of man he is, he couldn't.

SOLID NEW ENGLANDER

Roger Jones came to his civil-service job by chance, and had been in it 15 years before he realized fully that it was a career and he was a career man. But it was not by chance that he became a public servant. His inheritance and training had a lot to do with that.

He was born on February 3, 1908, in New Hartford, Conn., a small town 20 miles northwest of Hartford. His father, Henry Roger Jones, Jr., now the elder statesman of New Hartford, was practicing law in those days and running the local weekly, the New Hartford Tribune. The Jones family had been in New England since 1635, and Roger's mother, Eleanor Drake Jones, was old Connecticut, too. The son grew up in a strong New England Congregationalist atmosphere, with 10 generations of Yankee citizens behind him.

After going through local grade school and the Gilbert School in nearby Winsted, Roger was ready for Cornell (where his father had gone before) at 16. He was a good scholar, a battalion commander in the ROTC, and manager of the university musical club. After he was graduated with a B.A. in 1928, he spent a year teaching in the Coral Gables (Fla.) Military Academy. The next year he married Dorothy Heyl, Phi Beta Kappa, Cornell 1929, daughter of a Washington physicist, Paul Renno Heyl. Dorothy was working for a degree in library science at Columbia University and Roger had a job selling books for Doubleday, Doran in New York. He considered going into publishing, but after the crash there wasn't much left to go into, and anyway he found publishing too competitive for his liking.

DEPRESSION YEARS

He decided that what he really liked was teaching American literature, particularly the literature of Government and politics. He kept a part-time job with Doubleday while he took an M.A. at Columbia in 1931, and then quit the job to study full time for his doctorate. But life was hard in 1932; he couldn't afford to stay at Columbia, no teaching jobs were open, and his wife was going to have a baby. They went to New Hartford to live with his parents. Roger helped in his father's law office, and got an occasional tutoring job. He was unhappy, even bitter, about a society that wouldn't allow a man to earn a living in his chosen profession. After their first child, Cynthia, was born, the Joneses stayed on in New Hartford long enough to save a small amount of money. With that and a loan, Roger set out for Washington in the fall of 1933 to study in the Library of Congress for his doctor's dissertation. His ambition was to bridge the gap between belles-lettres and political literature.

It was hard to keep going financially, though, and when his wife's brother-in-law recommended Roger for a temporary job with the Central Statistical Board, he was glad to take it. Jones's job, helping to write a report on the activities of the Board, was to last a month, pay him about $200. When the month was up he was offered a 6-month appointment by the local board to work on administrative aspects of the general task of coordinating Federal statistics. He needed the money and he thought that practical experience in the Government would be valuable later in academic work. Also, he began to be interested in a Government that came down to the level of people's lives through the New Deal programs.

The first appointment was followed by another 6-month stretch. He was classified CAF grade 5, which was automatic for college graduates, at a salary of $2,000 a year, less a 15 percent "economy cut." In January 1935 he accepted a regular appointment from the board, expecting to stay for a year or so and accumulate a nest egg so he could continue working for his doctorate. He was an assistant executive officer and in 5 years he rose from CAF 5 to 7 to 9 to 11, taking the civil service examinations to stay in good standing although he had been classified in the beginning by statutory procedure.

In 1939 the Central Statistical Board was placed in the Bureau of the Budget, which at the same time was moved from Treasury to the executive offices—where it remains. Jones decided to leave and go back to his studies. Harold D. Smith, then the new Director of the Budget, asked him to stay on to help pull together the Bureau's administrative work. He was made administrative officer, CAF 12, salary, $4,600.

WAR YEARS

In addition to his administrative duties for the Bureau, Jones had a hand in setting up some of the defense organizations before World War II, notably the Office of Facts and Figures under General Donovan. Ever since his ROTC days at Cornell, he had been in the Army Reserve and spent 2 weeks each year in summer training. At Pearl Harbor time he was a Reserve captain of infantry. He expected regular duty, but Harry Hopkins and Isador Lubin, who were establishing the Munitions Assignments Board, knew Jones's aptitude for staff work and arranged to have him ordered to duty with the Combined Chiefs of Staff, assigned to the Board. He stayed there throughout the war, working with American and British officers on munitions pooling and assignment. He worked long, hard hours, rose from captain to major to lieutenant colonel to colonel. The strain caught up with him in 1944 and he was ill for several months, but at the end of the war he was back helping to liquidate the Board. For his services he was awarded the Legon of Merit and the Order of the British Empire. Harold Smith asked the Army to release him in 1945 and he went back to Budget to take a hand in liquidating other war agencies. He went back at his prewar rating, CAF 13, at $6,440 a year. And he still thought he would quit soon to finish his doctorate and go into teaching.

The Joneses had three children, Cynthia, born in 1933, Roger, Junior, born in 1935, and Edward Chapman, born in 1940. They lived in a rented house in Chevy Chase. The family spent the summer in a house they owned in New Hartford, where Jones joined them for his vacation of 26 working days, or 5 weeks a year. He still felt more at home in Connecticut than in Washington, and he made a point of keeping in touch with people there, and reading the local weekly so that he wouldn't become insular or ivory towerish in his bureaucratic job. In 1946, after Harold Smith resigned and James E. Webb was made Director of the Budget, Jones was put to work on special assignments (CAF–14) for the Bureau's Estimates Division. A year later he was made assistant to the Director for Legislative Liaison (CAF–15), which meant that he was in charge of Bureau contacts with Congress. He spent much of his time on the Hill and became familiar with the working of House and Senate committees. (Today, Jones seldom sees individual Congressmen. His work is with Congress and he wants to keep it impersonal.)

THE WAY UP

The next step, in 1948, made him Deputy Chief of Legislative Reference. At the same time he began to realize that he was no closer to taking that doctorate than he had been in 1933, that he might as well face the fact that he was not a teacher but a career man in Government service. The pay wasn't high, but it was more than he might have made teaching, and there was security in it for himself and his family. He was close to the civil service top and since it was a nonpolitical job he was unlikely to lose it under a new boss or a new administration.

The Joneses sold their New Hartford house and made a substantial downpayment on the house they now live in in Chevy Chase. Before long, in 1949, Jones was made Chief of the Office (his present job). When supergrades were created by law, his job was classified grade 17, which then had a salary of $12,200. The succeeding Directors of the Bureau, Frank Pace and Frederick J. Lawton, kept him on, and when the Republicans came in last January, Joseph M. Dodge, the new Director, made it clear that he wanted everyone except the political appointees at the top to go on working as usual. Mr. Dodge (see "The Banker in the Budget Bureau," Fortune, March 1953) is more involved in the administration's general policymaking than former Directors have been and he leaves the second-string jobs in the hands of his assistants. Jones is completely responsible for the work of his aids and for his own decisions; only when serious controversy arises with an agency does he go to the front office. His long administrative training and Army staff work (he learned a lot, he says, from the British on the Munitions Board) serve him well now.

The work of the office is categorized and each aid has charge of a segment. Jefferson Burris, for instance, is in charge of legislation dealing with commerce and finance, James Hyde for international and military affairs, Edward Bowers for enrolled bills (he also drafts most of the covering letters), Harry McKittrick for public works, etc. Mary Sabine, Jones' personal troubleshooter, has worked with him since the thirties; Ann Parshall, his secretary, was secretary to the two former Chiefs of the Office. Staff members think Jones is a fair and generous boss. "He tells you what he wants," says Mrs. Parshall, "but he lets you do it your own way." Morale is high, contrary to the prevailing climate in certain other Washington offices. Some 40,000 Government people have been fired and another 40,000 vacancies have not been filled since the start of the Eisenhower administration; many civil service workers can't be sure of their jobs from one day to another. The Budget Bureau, with comparatively few employees, most of them specialists in the higher grades, has not had severe cutbacks and the offices along the marble-floored corridors are quite calm. Jones' office is, if anything, understaffed. The men think Jones himself works too hard. "We try to keep work away from him," says Jim Hyde. "We try to make our own decisions, but he keeps everything in his mind and always makes the final decisions."

MEMO TO JONES

Some of the things Jones keeps in his mind are indicated by a typical file attached to one bill signed by the President last August. It concerned legislation to improve factory inspection of food and drugs by removing the necessity of written permission from the factory. The correspondence began on December 29, 1952, under the Truman administration, with a letter from John L. Thurston, Acting Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, to Frederick Lawton, then Director of the Budget: "There are transmitted to you herewith four copies of a draft bill 'To protect the public health and welfare by restoring authority for factory inspections under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act,' together with four copies of the proposed letter of transmittal to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Please advise us as to the relationship of this proposed legislation to the program of the President."

The bill and letter were routed to Roger Jones and turned over by him to Earl Radley, his assistant in charge of legislation for labor, welfare, and education. Mr. Radley, in an office memorandum on January 14, 1953, proposed certain word changes and suggested the idea be developed "that from a budgetary standpoint inspection is the most inexpensive and practical method of regulation." The memo further noted that Mr. Jones already had checked Justice and telephoned a no objection clearance to Rufus Miles at FSA. The telephone conversation was confirmed by letter on January 15. The Treasury and the Federal Trade Commission were asked for opinions and returned no comment letters.

UNDER NEW ADMINISTRATION

On January 26 Senator H. Alexander Smith wrote Mr. Dodge, asking for a report on the bill, and the letter came to Jones' office. On March 2, Oveta Culp Hobby, the new Administrator of FSA (later Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare), wrote Senator Smith and Congressman Wolverton urging passage of the legislation (S. 835 and H.R. 2769), and 2 days later copies of these letters were sent to Jones with a covering note saying, "These reports were cleared by telephone with Mr. Bowers of the Bureau by Mr. Ellenbogen of this Agency." On March 16 the Budget Bureau advised Senator Smith that enactment of the legislation would be in accord with the President's program.

On July 20, Senator Smith sent a revised bill, H.R. 5740, which had been passed by the House, to Mr. Dodge (Jones) asking for a report at the earliest possible moment. On July 24 there was a yellow memo from Ellenbogen in HEW to Jones sending copies of the proposed report to the Senate committee, and asking for quick review. Miles, said the memo, would call. On July 27 there was a blue memo to Jones from Radley saying clearance was being rushed, with a penciled addition for the record, "Mr. Jones advised Rufus Miles NOB (no objections)." Another blue memo on the same date came from HEW; the bill, it said, was not perfect, but would meet basic needs. On July 30, Lane of HEW submitted Mrs. Hobby's recommendation to Roger Jones, "this report was cleared by telephone with you by Mr. Miles of this Department." On August 3 the bill was passed by the Senate.

FINAL PROCESSING

The next day Mr. Jones wrote Justice and HEW for their reports on the enrolled bill. On August 6, Justice replied that it had no objection, and Mrs. Hobby wrote to Mr. Dodge, "This is in response to Mr. Jones' letter of August 4. The legislation * * * may limit the inspection authority * * *. Whether and to what extent this legislative history may adversely affect enforcement of the law and indicate the desirability of amendatory legislation can only be determined on the basis of accumulated experience under the new law." Mrs. Hobby recommended that the bill be approved.

On August 7, Roger W. Jones wrote his covering letter to the President. The bill, he said, would provide basic inspection authority although it might not provide all the authority considered necessary. "The constitutionality of the proposed legislation was questioned during the course of its consideration by the Congress. We believe that the presumption of constitutionality attaching to measures passed by the Congress should be accorded to H. R. 5740 and that any question in this regard should be left to the judiciary." He pointed out that HEW recommended approval and that Justice interposed no objection. "In view of the urgent need for legislation to enable the Food and Drug Administration to carry on its inspection program, the Bureau of the Budget recommends that the bill be approved." The same day the bill was signed by President Eisenhower.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

Jones comes home from work about 6:30 in the evening, tired, with a clear conscience. After supper with the family, he and his wife may sit for a while on the terrace by the fish pool out in the backyard or help Edward with his homework. Later Jones takes a look at the Evening Star and settles down to an hour's reading of reports or the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Perhaps he and his wife will go for a walk in the evening or take a drive or drop in on friends for a talk. They don't entertain often, don't like big cocktail parties or official affairs.

Jones doesn't have much time for reading; when he does, it is usually history or poetry, particularly Browning. ("I even play around with verse forms myself sometimes. Very relaxing.") He likes to garden, but doesn't have time to do more than keep up the lawn and shrubbery. When Congress is not in session, he has Saturday afternoons off and can catch up on such chores as getting his hair cut or having the car, a 1951 Chevrolet, greased. On Sundays there are the morning papers to read, church, dinner, a call on Mrs. Jones' mother and father. Occasionally Jones takes Edward to a baseball or football game in the afternoon. More often he takes a walk or works in the yard.

The house at 10 West Leland, a quiet, shady street in Chevy Chase, is unpretentious and comfortable. Edward, 13, is the only child at home now. Cynthia is married and has a daughter of her own. Roger Jr., went to Cornell as a freshman this year. Mr. and Mrs. Jones give time and energy to All Saints Church, the Community Chest, and the Washington Institute of Mental Hygiene, but Mrs. Jones is not content to be just a middle-aged do-gooder. She has put her library-science degree to work and has taken a part-time job with the Montgomery County Library. She likes it, and even a small addition to Jones' salary helps. She has a cleaning woman once a week, but does the rest of the work herself, the cooking and dusting and most of the washing and ironing.

BUDGETEER'S BUDGET

As might be expected, the Joneses keep a careful budget—and stick to it. From the $13,400 salary, $2,147.12 is deducted for income tax and $804 for retirement, leaving take-home pay of $10,448.88 a year. Ceilings have been fixed on regular recurrent items in the monthly budget. They total $706 a month and include college expenses for Roger Jr.; payment on the mortgage (now reduced to $9,000); an allowance of $1 a day for each member of the family for food (plus milk, eggs, and butter at $30 a month); utilities, cleaning, gas and oil for the car; church; newspapers, Edward's allowance; recreation, medical and dental bills. The Joneses allow $60 a month to meet all their clothing and other purchases from Washington stores. A repair-and-maintenance account of $30 a month is kept for the house. Jones allows himself $40 a month for personal expenses, including lunches.

When all these items are accounted for, there is left an annual balance of $1,976.88. This is reserved for paying bills that accrue on an annual basis. This year the balance is allocated as follows:

Life insurance	$536.00
Household and car insurance	166.00
House taxes	375.00
Maryland income tax	160.00
Federal income tax (in addition to the deducted tax)	200.00
Charities	150.00
Water	40.00
Car repair and upkeep	100.00
Reserve for contingencies	349.88
Total	1,976.88

So long as the boys are being educated and the house is being paid for, not much money will be left in the bank at the end of the year. But a good thing about a civil-service job is the security it offers. If Jones works another 10 years, as he intends to do, he can retire from Federal service at the age of 55 with an annual pension computed on the basis of 1½ percent for each year of service, figured on his highest 5 years' overall salary. After 30 years that will mean an annuity of something over $5,000. If he should die, Dorothy and the children would get a pension of half the annuity he had earned at the time of his death, plus his life insurance. The pension is one reason that he has turned down several offers of higher-paid position in private industry. One reason. The others are that he likes his work and does it well. And above and beyond them all is his sense of duty. He is serving the President of the United States (whether a Democrat or a Republican) and the people of the United States to the best of his ability. And when he leaves the Government in 1963 he intends to go on serving, either as a teacher ("I feel I have an obligation to pass on to others what I have learned here") or in some local office ("I shall have done my duty at the Federal level, but I owe something to Connecticut and New Hartford, too"). If he can't get a teacher's post at Cornell, his first choice, or Wesleyan or the University of Connecticut, he probably will go back home and run for selectman or the legislature.

Roger Jones is pleasantly content with his life and work. He makes enough money to live comfortably and to educate his children and provide for the future. He is devoted to his family, and to his job. "God and the Government," he says, "have been very, very good to me."

DEPARTURE OF SENATOR BUTLER FROM COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, it is with great regret that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary have learned that the distinguished senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], who is the present occupant of the chair, will not be a member of the committee in the coming session. He and I have differed sharply on a number of occasions; but in the course of our discussions and debates in the committee, I have always learned and been edified; and our debates in the Senate Chamber, in which he and I often have taken opposite sides, have always been conducted in the best of spirits, and I trust that will always be the case.

We who serve on the Judiciary Committee shall miss the Senator from Maryland very much indeed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The Chair desires to thank the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I should like to supplement the remarks made by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] commenting on the distinguished occupant of the chair, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER]. I wish to state that the loss to the Judiciary Committee will result in a very proud gain to the Finance Committee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I wish to join with other Senators who have spoken on the matter in expressing my personal regret that the Senator presently occupying the chair [Mr. BUTLER] has departed from the Judiciary Committee, where our relationships were very, very pleasant.

CONDITIONS IN CUBA

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, in recent weeks, and certainly in recent days, there has been a great deal written and said about the revolution which has just been completed in Cuba. There is much being said about a young man by the name of Fidel Castro. Because of my long interest in the Latin American area, and because of some knowledge I have had about this young man for some time, I have been asked from time to time to make a statement about it. Up to last Saturday I had refused to do so. But I thought possibly the time had arrived when a statement should be made. The statement which I had released Saturday, January 17, did not get very wide publicity and was not carried over many means of communication, so I take this opportunity to read it into the RECORD:

I think most informed people know of my long and enduring interest in Latin America. I have spent many years studying its people, their histories and background, and their problems. That is the reason why I did not rush into print when it appeared that the Castro movement would be successful in Cuba.

I have followed with much interest the history of Fidel Castro since I first learned about him in the revolt at Bogotá, Colombia, in 1948; thereafter, his activities as a member of the Caribbean Legion, his prerevolutionary activities in Mexico, and, of course, his efforts starting with a landing on the island of Cuba, 2 years ago.

I have heard enough about him to cause me to reserve judgment on him. He has appointed good and proven men to important posts in the government. There can be no question of his courage, nor love of his country, but there likewise can be no question of his youth, his inexperience, and the dubious reputations of some of his past associates.

I, therefore, have reserved judgment on the quality of his ambitions, his capacity to administer the affairs of Cuba, his understanding of democracy, and his judgment and his tolerance. That is why, when many of his supporters in my State urged me to "jump on his bandwagon" as he gained strength in the recent successful revolution in Cuba, I refrained from so doing. My response then was that we could take heart that it appeared that greater democracy and freedom was on the way for Cubans, but it was too early to go overboard on Castro. Despite the lyrical buildup he was getting from the American press, radio, and television—it was far too soon to determine whether that in the long run the people of Cuba had improved their position by merely the change of governments.

In my opinion, it is still too early for final judgment. A continuation of the peremptory executions of those who disagree with Castro would lead to the inevitable conclusion that the Cuban people have escaped from one form of a dictatorship, only to find themselves under a more virulent brand.

The American people love the Cubans and suffer with them in this hour of their torment. We would all like to help them. But what Solomon is there who knows the answer at this moment? In view of the fact that some already went overboard too hastily on one side, would it not now appear most sensible for us all to restrain ourselves, our statements, our judgments, until the picture gets a bit more clear?

I think our State Department has done a good job under extremely trying circumstances. They properly did not effusively clutch or attach us to the uncertain future of Castro. They have learned, as we all should have, that all dictators who come to power do so shouting "freedom for the people" and "democracy for all."

Surely one who so shouts has not proven thereby that he is a George Washington or a Simon Bolivar.

The State Department acted with proper restraint, stating that the problem is first of all that of the Cubans—which, of course, it is, and always will be—and that the United States ever stands ready and anxious to help the cause of freedom and liberty when we know that the vehicle on which it is moving is genuine.

It is too bad that some of us hadn't studied Latin American history a bit more than we did, or remembered as well as did the State Department. It would have saved the necessity of reversing the field as we now see taking place on all sides.

Everyone deplores killings and bloodshed. All Americans love liberty and democracy. We know its wonderful blessings, and we want them for others. But, let us remember that all people are not exactly like we are. The Latin temperament and background are different from ours. The Latins may not fit exactly into the mold we mentally prepare for them. In short, let us be as mature and objective about these changes in Latin American governments as past history and recent facts tell us we should be.

Let us hope and pray for a happy salvation for Cuba. Let us hope and pray Fidel Castro rectifies his ways and becomes as benign and democratic as some people believed he would be.

Let us leave the problem of U.S. relationships with Cuba in the hands of the State Department which has men who have devoted a lifetime of study to these problems.

Let us, for the time being, at least, stop challenging and disparaging the new regime.

These belligerent assertions and imprecations from the safety of our desks and chambers don't make it easier for those poor Cubans caught in the crossfire of changing governments.

Hereafter, I expect to follow my own advice, and this is the first and last communique I will issue, at least for a while.

Mr. President, yesterday every Member of the Senate, and I think every Member of the House, received an invitation from Fidel Castro to attend a mass demonstration tomorrow in Havana, at the beginning of the war trials there.

I ask unanimous consent to submit for the RECORD at this time the answer which I sent to Mr. Fidel Castro.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 19, 1959.

I am in receipt of your invitation to witness the war criminal trial and gathering of 1 million Cubans on Wednesday, January 21, in Havana.

As a longtime friend of your country, I have a deep and abiding interest in its affairs. However, I think no useful purpose can be served by my presence or my comments on this occasion. I think too much has already been said by individuals who at present know too little about what's going on in your country.

There are many people who have placed great trust and hope in your ability to bring order in Cuba and provide a government recognizing human rights, personal freedom and democracy.

I join with them in prayers for forbearance and a sensible approach to the many problems with which you are now confronted.

Your name will be judged in history not so much on how many demonstrations are held but rather upon how well you lead the people of Cuba down the road to a better economic position, a greater democracy and a recognition of personal rights.

This is a time for restraint on the part of all. It is my hope that all of us will stop shooting and shouting on these important matters where hasty decisions mean ill-considered acts.

In my judgment, the time has come for U.S. relationship with Cuba to be put back in its its proper channel where our State Department speaks and acts for us all.

TOURIST DIPLOMACY

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article which appeared in last night's Washington Evening Star, written by former President Harry S. Truman. It is entitled, "Truman Warns United States of Tourist Diplomacy."

While most of the article had to do with the problem of Mikoyan's visit to this country, nevertheless I think some of the things which the former President said can well be applied to the consideration of problems concerning Cuba.

I read briefly from the article:

Those of our own people—whether they travel to Moscow or whether they have been hosts to Mikoyan here in this country—must understand that they have no responsibility for the shaping of American foreign policy.

Later the article reads:

And I must say that our diplomatic tourists and some of our industrial leaders have been of little help in clearing the air. Diplomacy by press interviews, special audiences, or fishing expeditions can only compound an already complicated situation.

The first thing these people must understand is that, under our Constitution, there is only one place where foreign policy is made, and that is in the White House, and by no one other than the President of the United States, himself. He cannot delegate or share this responsibility, nor can others assume it.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire article written by former President Truman be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN WARNS UNITED STATES OF TOURIST DIPLOMACY

(By Hon. Harry S. Truman)

I hope that the recent crop of diplomatic tourists does not get us into more complications at a time when the free world is trying to find how to deal with the Communist world.

Those of our own people—whether they travel to Moscow or whether they have been hosts to Mikoyan here in this country—must understand that they have no responsibility for the shaping of American foreign policy.

I am particularly disturbed by the eagerness displayed by some of our leading industrialists and financiers to shower the visiting Soviet Deputy Prime Minister with solicitous attention and social glamour resulting in pressure on the White House.

There is considerable difference between negotiations by governments and the probing by individuals for some kind of a deal.

I am all in favor of negotiations—no matter how trying to our patience—with anyone currently in power in Russia, be he Khrushchev, his deputy, or anyone else.

USE TALKS FOR PROPAGANDA

We have had many long and exhausting talks with Stalin, Molotov, Gromyko, Bulganin, Zhukov, Khrushchev and others, but up to now these talks have been futile as far as reaching even a working basis, much less a peaceful accord, with the changing figures in the Kremlin.

The Kremlin has used all these talks to feed its propaganda mills.

The situation with regard to the establishment of peace is, in reality, very simple. But the Russians and the Chinese insist on making matters complicated.

And I must say that our diplomatic tourists and some of our industrial leaders have been of little help in clearing the air. Diplomacy by press interviews, special audiences or fishing expeditions can only compound an already complicated situation.

POLICY UP TO PRESIDENT

The first thing these people must understand is that, under our Constitution, there is only one place where foreign policy is made, and that is in the White House, and by no one other than the President of the United States, himself. He cannot delegate or share this responsibility, nor can others assume it.

And until the President of the United States decides what our foreign policy is and says what it is and stays with it, any statements or declarations made by diplomatic tourists serve no useful purpose in our relations with the Communist world.

We always wish to be generous and agreeable hosts. This is an American tradition, but let us not deceive ourselves about the method of solving our acute diplomatic ills in our relations with the Kremlin.

Surely, the visit to this country by Mikoyan, ostensibly as a tourist but in reality in a mood to negotiate, is not the way to do official business, diplomatic or otherwise, with the United States. It could arouse suspicion among our allies that we are susceptible to unilateral negotiations with Russia which would be harmful to the cause of the free West.

Since leaving the White House, I frequently have been called on by representatives of foreign governments. More recently, while in Washington to see the opening of the 86th Congress, a responsible representative of one of our principal allies came to see me at the request of the head of his government. The purpose of his call was to tell me of his country's fears that we in the United States do not have a clear understanding of the dangers confronting his government and the free nations of the world today.

I told him that he was free, of course, to talk to anyone in this country, but for practical reasons there was no purpose in his talking to anyone except the President of the United States, and that he should try to see him or his constitutional representative.

I would caution some of our well-meaning, self-appointed, self-assumed peacemakers to be careful lest they forget, in their ardor, that the President makes foreign policy and they may inadvertently lend themselves to the propaganda purposes of our adversaries.

We must face the fact that unless the President of the United States is fully informed and is acutely sensitive to all the implications of all that is going on all over the globe, we will be in grave trouble indeed.

The President, who has access to sources and types of information available to no one else, should be in a better position to arrive at judgments to shape our foreign policy. Any suggestions of division among ourselves at this time on the aims of our foreign policy can only serve the Communist propagandists.

With reference to Mikoyan's visit, I am less apprehensive about the rank and file of the people being taken in by Communist maneuvers than I am about some of the financiers and industrialists who are so easily affected by a prospective source of new business that they fail to balance this interest against the national interests and the security of the country as a whole.

We have the tragic experiences with this kind of shortsightedness and gullibility prior to and during the Second World War.

I have always favored tourist exchanges between our two opposing systems in the broadest possible manner. We should encourage teachers, students, artists, farmers, businessmen, financiers, industrialists, members of Government and other representative officials and groups to visit Russia and to receive similar groups coming to us from Russia.

I am glad, therefore, that so many of our businessmen, writers, journalists and political leaders have traveled to Russia and were accorded important interviews there. Any new information that came out of those interviews was certainly a net gain.

But I do feel that in some instances interviews by those who are not journalists have lent themselves unwittingly to maneuvers of the Kremlin to appeal to our people over the heads of the Government.

I think that one of our difficulties with the Russians in recent years has been our failure to realize that the Communists have been acting on the premise: "When you are selling something, you ask for more than you expect to get." These are the words of Mikoyan in his effort to explain to us Russia's tough position on Berlin.

Where we made our mistake in those years was giving the Russians the impression that we would yield to bargaining and trading and that we would be for peace at any price.

My experience with the Kremlin taught me very early that to yield an inch in the area of their expansionist aims is fatal. They must understand that we are for peace on equitable and reasonable terms and will not yield to their pressure.

I know from experience that it is not enough for us to keep saying that we want peace. The Russians keep doing that, too.

We need to make our purposes and objectives clearly understood at all times so that the Russians cannot mislead or confuse the world by their professions of peace.

One thing I hope Mikoyan—shrewd observer that he is—will tell the Kremlin is that our free industrial and economic society has no reason to emulate Russian state capitalism. As for Russian achievement in military science, I hope that Mikoyan, having seen our industrial might and potential—will realize our capabilities to meet any Russian challenge in that area—no matter what gross mistakes we have made or what lapses in our leadership have cost us.

I would suggest to Mikoyan that he also tell his people that while our people are friendly and want peace, they do not frighten easily.

SOVIET IN TROUBLE

Russia knows she has nothing to fear from us. We covet nothing she has. All we want from Russia is her cooperation in assuring the peace of the world. So far, she has steadfastly refused.

Well, then why is Mikoyan here?

Perhaps one reason is that Russia is seeking another meeting at the summit. It would seem to me that Russia now finds herself in trouble in the West and in the East.

In the West, she has seen devastated free Western Europe emerge into mighty industrial powers with their people enjoying a high and growing standard of living.

In dramatic contrast, Russia chose to concentrate her resources since the war on building up military power and to apply her scientific skills to military purposes. This she did at the expense of the living standards of her people.

Added to her failure at home to meet the needs of her civilian population, she is now confronted by serious economic difficulties in her satellite states.

At the same time West Berlin has become a constant reminder of the startling differences between free West Berlin and Communist-captive East Berlin. The comparison is odious and annoying to the Communists.

Mikoyan understandably would like to arrange with us to supply Russia with certain goods and materials to help bolster, not only the Russian economy, but that of her satellites.

EXTENSION OF THE SUGAR ACT OF 1948

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I should like to discuss one of the sweeter things in life—namely, the Sugar Act. In that connection, Mr. President, I shall abide by the 3-minute rule.

Although the 1956 revision of the Sugar Act of 1948 will be in force until next year, I believe that it is not premature to address ourselves now to elements which we must consider when a further extension of the act will be contemplated.

At this time I wish particularly to emphasize the position of the Republic of the Philippines in connection with the allotment of quotas to suppliers to the United States of sugar for domestic consumption. Many of us shared acutely the disappointment of the Philippines when, in 1956, the sugar producers of that area were given no participation in filling the increased demands of users in the United States. The President, in his message accompanying approval of the extension act, stated:

It was not considered feasible to recommend an increase in the Philippine quota at this time. I believe, therefore, that when new amendments are being prepared at the conclusion of the present act, consideration should be given to allowing the Philippines to share in increased consumption, as is now provided for other foreign countries by this bill.

What was true of the position of the Philippine sugar suppliers and the state of the Philippine economy 3 years ago remains true today with even greater validity as to the suppliers and increased poignancy as to the hardships of our sister Republic. In the extensive hearings of the Committee on Finance on proposals to amend and extend the Sugar Act of 1948, a strong case was presented in behalf of Philippine sugar suppliers for participation in increased quotas due to higher consumption of sugar in the United States. Nevertheless, the quotas to fill the substantial domestic increased demand were allotted to Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Peru, Mexico, and others, but none to the Philippines. No objection is raised as to the participation in the increase by U.S. suppliers, but I do question the result that, alone among foreign suppliers, the Philippines appear to have suffered from discrimination, which is all the more severe, since Philippine imports become duty-paying in increasing degrees.

I need not dwell long upon historical events intimately known to all of us. The Philippines were our charge for half a century, and in 1946 entered the society of independent nations, with our encouragement and blessing, to become the showcase of democratic government in the Far East. The wounds of a war in which that courageous people had stood stalwartly by the allied forces of freedom were not quick in healing.

The generosity of the United States in making compensation for war losses, in advancing funds for physical repair, and toward the intangible rehabilitation of its institutions has not been slighted. What we have done in the past, however, should not now impair our recognition of the continuing friendship of the Philippines and the courage and resoluteness of its Government in combating the infiltration of insidious Communist subversives, and participating on the side of the free world in cooperative economic and political advances of Far-Eastern nations.

The present economic plight of the Philippines results from a number of considerations upon which I do not propose to dwell at this time, although an analysis of the background of apparent failures is not irrelevant. The experimental nature of some of the efforts toward recovery after the war understandably resulted in more disappointments than satisfactions. The industrialization of the Philippines, a country of traditionally agricultural pursuits, and high in the potential of natural resources, was a dream not ready for immediate fulfillment. The temptation to import luxury items after a long period of deprivation of even the simplest necessities represented a normal human weakness, with obvious disastrous results to Philippine money reserves.

The President of the Philippines made a visit to this country during 1958, and, according to reports, was graciously and hospitably received by officials of our Government. Nevertheless, he returned to his country with far less in the way of commitments for economic aid than had been announced as his objective. We are informed by the press and releases of Government agencies that the economic insecurity of the Philippines has been dangerously mounting, and that the country is close to bankruptcy. There may be a difference of opinion as to methods of helping the Philippines by further loans; the payment of the balance of war damages awarded, but unpaid, under the terms of the Philippine Rehabilitation Act; the extension of economic aid under one or another of the programs of the United States or direct grants. But all of us must agree that it is inconceivable for us to disregard the crisis in a country with which our ties have been cemented to an extent unprecedented in our history.

While our representatives are discussing agreements concerning military bases, assistance, and mutual defense, the further crystallizing of trade relations, and the taking of other steps which will encourage the maintenance of our close connection in every respect with the Philippines, it would seem to be a gesture of the most thoughtless inconsistency for us to fail to include that country in the increased sugar quotas which we shall be called upon to consider in the next revision of the Sugar Act of 1948.

The sugar industry in the Philippines is probably the only one which has experienced complete rehabilitation since the end of the war, despite the fact that the equipment and resources of this industry suffered immediate and total destruction by the Japanese and as a result of usual war hazards. While experimentation and exploitation in other industries and fields of endeavor in the growth of the Philippine economy have been taking place, sugar has remained an exportable and paying crop without any additional expense, complicated machinery of aid or lending programs, or controversial political undertakings. We have an opportunity to extend to the Philippines considerable economic help by granting it an opportunity to supply a portion of our increased demand for sugar.

In a broad sense this opportunity should be an expected privilege of the Philippines among all of the foreign sugar producing states with which we are required to do business. Not only do we meet a critical condition in the Philippines by favoring an additional allotment to the Philippines in further quotas of sugar importation, but in so doing we observe a historical or traditional pattern whereby, prior to 1948, the Philippines shared more largely in our sugar importation than under the 1948 act and the 1956 amendments, where we departed from the past without realistically facing the present or the future.

In quoting from the report of hearings before the Committee on Finance of the 84th Congress on House bill 7030, let me point out:

In the 1948 act, the fixed tonnage quota of the Philippines Trade Act of 1946 was substituted for the percentage quota of the 1937 act. This change had the effect of reducing the Philippines' share by 2.9 percentage points with total requirements at 7.8 million tons, and by about 3.6 percent with total requirements at 8.2 million tons. Cuba and the "full duty" countries became the residual suppliers of the market. Cuba's share was increased from 28.6 percent under the 1937 act to 32.3 percent with total requirements assumed at 7.8 million tons under the 1948 act, and to 32.6 percent with total requirements assumed at 8.2 million tons under the 1951 amendments. The amendment approximately trebled the share of the "full duty" countries.

I am not unaware of the representations made in connection with the sugar producers and exporters of other friendly lands, such as Cuba and Mexico. Sound arguments have been offered to the effect that depriving opportunities in the field of sugar to essentially one-crop nations, such as Cuba, might entail unrest, economic upheaval, and possibly total collapse. We have observed that even after making concessions in the face of such arguments, and after considering very sympathetically and generously the position of Cuba, the contribution which we made to political stability in that land has apparently been inconsequential. On the other hand, the problem in the Philippines is much larger. The Philippines' economic situation at this time has a significance in which we are immediately and intimately involved because of its proximity to what might be termed the center of gravity of the Communist threat to the institutions of the free world.

I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that when we are called upon to consider a revision of the act providing for our sugar needs we do not again fail to recognize the equities of the Philippines, as entitled to a larger share of our imports as a matter of history and as an immediate economic necessity of a warm friend and faithful ally.

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY'S GREAT TEACHER AWARD

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, one of the most pressing problems we have in our national defense and in the world race for technological leadership is the education of our youth.

The teacher stands as an important symbol in this problem. Anything that is done to attract superior people to the teaching profession and to hold those superior people now serving as educators is most worthy and vital.

The Alumni Federation of my university, New York University, has just taken a noteworthy and dramatic step to bring to the attention of the Nation this indispensable member of society, the teacher.

The New York University Alumni Federation has established a great teacher award. Briefly, this program provides that three members of the faculty will be cited each year as great teachers. Each will receive a cash award of $1,000 from the alumni.

The New York University Alumni News had this to say editorially about the program when it was established:

The great teacher awards program instituted by the Alumni Federation was designed primarily to bring long-overdue recognition and reward to the honorable profession of teaching. Never before in our country's history has there been so striking a need to call attention to the educator, to his problems, to the invaluable service he performs.

New York University's graduates, through the Alumni Federation, are not simply giving the professor a pat on the back; they are also putting some tangible evidence of their appreciation into his pocket.

This perhaps tells the great value of this program best. Several of our great newspapers have spoken of it favorably in editorials; so have prominent radio and television commentators.

It would appear that the idea is catching on elsewhere. I learned on a recent visit to New York University that since the announcement of the great teacher program, many other universities have requested details on the plan; with the thought in mind that they, too, might institute a similar program.

This program, in itself, is of course not sufficient. We need a program of Federal support for schoolroom construction and teacher salaries, as envisioned in S. 2, the School Support Act of 1959, whereby hundreds of thousands of elementary and secondary classroom teachers would receive the decent compensation they deserve for their great service. But the great teacher award is a good development worthy of study by other alumni organizations and groups interested in better education. Widespread adoption of this plan will lead to greatly improved teaching in the Nation's institutions of higher learning.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed immediately following these remarks an article and an editorial from the New York University Alumni News of November 1958, and another article from the same publication of December 1958.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ALUMNI AWARDS PROGRAM WILL HONOR GREAT TEACHERS—THREE PROFESSORS TO BE CITED ANNUALLY—EACH TO GET $1,000

The Alumni Federation of New York University has established a great teacher award as a tribute to the faculty.

Beginning with this academic year, three professors will be cited annually as great teachers. Each will receive a cash award of $1,000 from the alumni.

Teaching excellence will be the sole consideration in the selection of the award winners. Achievements of faculty members in lines other than teaching will be considered only as they affect teaching quality.

Although the Alumni Federation is the sponsor of the award and alumni are expected to be prominent among those nominating candidates, the accolade of great teachers will not be bestowed by the graduates. In presenting the program to the university, the federation stipulated that professors be chosen by their colleagues.

THREE JUDGES

Three elected members of the university senate will serve as a selection committee each year to consider the nominees and name the winners. Members of the selection committee will be appointed to 1-year terms by the university president in his role as president of the university senate. Selection committee members will not be eligible for the great teacher award in the year in which they are engaged as judges of their peers.

Any alumnus or faculty member may nominate a candidate. Nominations must be in writing and may be submitted only to the secretary of the Alumni Federation. Nominations must be postmarked no later than February 1, 1959, to be considered for the 1959 selection of great teachers. Under the terms of the program, a supporting statement not to exceed 350 words may accompany a nomination.

ANNOUNCEMENT IN SPRING

Shortly after February 1 each year, the secretary of the Alumni Federation will transmit all nominations to the selection committee for its deliberations. At a university ceremony sometime in the spring, the great teachers will be announced and they will receive their citations and awards from the president of the Alumni Federation.

The proposal for the awards program was initiated last year by the alumni communications committee. The undertaking was studied and planned by a communications subcommittee headed by Madeline McWhinney, '47GBA, and Martin G. Waldman, '48W, and then submitted by the committee chairman, William J. Davison, '39A, to the board of directors of the Alumni Federation. That body approved the program and placed it before University President Carroll V. Newsom. He greeted the plan enthusiastically and termed it an excellent means of encouraging and rewarding outstanding teachers.

Final details were completed by a university senate committee and an Alumni Federation committee, working jointly. Prof. Hollis R. Cooley, '37G, of Washington Square College, was chairman of this six-man body. Other senate members were Dean G. Rowland Collins, '22GBA, of the Graduate School of Business Administration, and Prof. James H. Mulligan, Jr., of the College of Engineering. Federation representatives were Mr. Davidson, B. A. Ross, '25C, alumni secretary, and Stanley Sapin, '34C, director of alumni communications.

EXCELLENCE IS DEFINED

Professor Cooley stressed that the award would be given primarily for present excellence, rather than for past performance. "Continuing effectiveness over a period of time will inevitably carry some weight with the selection committee, however," he said.

"Excellence in teaching implies a high level of success in leading students to knowledge and understanding of the subject matter taught," Dr. Cooley stated. "It must also be judged according to the degree and quality of inspiration transmitted to students and the example of intellectual integrity that is afforded by the teacher."

Any member of the faculty is eligible for great teacher designation in a year in which he has taught at least two courses throughout the year. "The award shall be made," the Cooley committee said, "for excellence in teaching without discrimination based on school, rank, age, sex, or distinction not directly related to teaching."

President Newsom has named as members of the selection committee for 1959, Profs. Harmon M. Chapman of University College, Forrest E. Long, '28Ed., of the School of Education, and Godfrey E. Updike, '24L, of the School of Law.

"GREAT TEACHERS ARE GREAT MEN"—NEWSOM

The following is a statement by President Carroll V. Newsom concerning the establishment by the Alumni Federation of the great teacher awards:

"In all the great cultural traditions of the world noted teachers have held special positions of esteem. This is inevitable, for the promulgation of the culture, its elaboration and extension, belong essentially to those accepted as teachers. The scientist points with appreciation to a teacher who stimulated and inspired him. The professional or business leader recalls with enthusiasm the teacher who opened doors or painted pictures.

"The teacher who is revered must be humble; he must have great respect for people, their interests and their abilities; and he must be dedicated to his task. Otherwise it would be impossible to mold the minds of students in a significant way. Thus great teachers are also great men, so homage is doubly due them from all who desire the good society that is the dream of men everywhere.

"How appropriate, then, that the alumni of the largest private university in the land, with its unique tradition that many institutions envy, should take specific steps to recognize in a tangible way the great teachers of their own alma mater. It is so very right that comment is virtually unnecessary. Certainly the action itself is a tribute to a fine body of men and women who have learned what is really meaningful in a world of questions and doubt."

HE WAS A GREAT TEACHER

The great teacher awards program instituted by the Alumni Federation was designed primarily to bring long overdue recognition and reward to the honorable profession of teaching. Never before in our country's history has there been so striking a need to call attention to the educator, to his problems, to the invaluable service he performs.

New York University's graduates, through the Alumni Federation, are not simply giving the professor a pat on the back. They are also putting some tangible evidence of their appreciation into his pocket.

It is hoped that the title "Great Teacher" is one that faculty members will carry with pride and distinction. The title was chosen for the simplest of reasons: It is a phrase used conversationally time and again when alumni gather for homecomings and reunions. Inevitably, discussion of the old days will lead someone to refer to a beloved professor. Just as inevitable is the reply, "Of course I remember him * * * he was a great teacher."

A word about three professors, named Chapman, Long, and Updike, who compose the selection committee this year for the great teacher awards. The Alumni Federation is eager to see these gentlemen overworked late this winter, once the nominating period for the awards closes. Nothing will please the proponents of the awards program better than that Messrs. Chapman, Long, and Updike be inundated with candidates. To that end, alumni and faculty are urged to nominate those teachers they deem worthy of acclaim as great teachers.

GREAT TEACHER PROGRAM EARNS PRESS ACCLAIM

Widespread acclaim in the press, over the airwaves and in university ranks greeted last month's announcement by the Alumni Federation of the great teacher awards.

The program honors members of the faculty for teaching excellence. Three professors will be cited annually, beginning this academic year, and each will receive an award of $1,000 from the alumni.

A FINE IDEA

The New York Herald Tribune saluted the plan editorially, calling it a fine idea.

"There are many ways to measure a teacher's worth, of course," the Herald Tribune said. "Certainly the academic man deserves credit for the writing and research that he does in his special area of scholarship, for these widen our horizons of knowledge. But it is in the classroom that a great teacher truly leaves his stamp.

"It's a wise student who recognizes the great teacher," the newspaper stated, "and a wise university that honors him."

The New York World-Telegram and Sun also gave editorial attention to the program. Quoting President Carroll V. Newsom, who had called the Alumni Federation project "an excellent means of encouraging and rewarding outstanding teachers," it said, "we fully agree and hope the idea is contagious."

Lowell Thomas told his WCBS radio audience about the undertaking. "Timely recognition of the immense importance of the teaching profession," he said. "Thousand dollar apples for teacher. Who knows, maybe the idea will spread from coast to coast."

TEACHING AN ART

Max Lerner, author and lecturer, praised the program in his column in the New York Post. Said Mr. Lerner, "I like the idea of the New York University alumni who are presenting checks for $1,000 annually to the three men who win the great teacher awards. I like it because it implies that teaching is an art, and a competitive one, and even a great one."

Although the Alumni Federation is sponsoring the program, great teachers will be chosen by their colleagues. Selection will be made by a committee of three elected members of the university senate. Committee members will be appointed to 1-year terms by the university president as head of the senate. They will not be eligible for the award in the year they serve as judges.

President Newsom has named as members of the selection committee for 1959, Profs. Harmon M. Chapman, of University College; Forrest E. Long, '28Ed, of the School of Education; and Godfrey E. Updike, '24L, of the School of Law.

Any alumnus or faculty member may nominate a candidate. Nominations should be sent to the secretary of the Alumni Federation, at 100 Washington Square, New York 3. They must be postmarked no later than February 1, to be considered for the 1959 selection of great teachers. A supporting statement, not to exceed 350 words, may accompany a nomination.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to address an inquiry to the majority leader as to the program for the balance of the day and for tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I cannot speak as to the balance of the time today, other than to assume the Senate will stay in session as long as any Senator desires to address the Senate. I do not anticipate action on legislation of any type, because the committees have not organized as yet.

A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENNETT in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What time is the joint meeting to be held tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no specific information as to the time of the joint meeting tomorrow. The joint meetings take place usually at 12:30. Perhaps that will be the case tomorrow.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 11:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand adjourned until 11:45 a.m. tomorrow. I may ask to modify that order later, if the time of the joint meeting is to be 12:30.

So far as I know, there will be no business transacted other than routine business.

AIRPORT DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I was shocked to read the following from an Associated Press dispatch this morning:

Republican congressional leaders came out of a meeting with President Eisenhower today, and declared that the Democratic housing legislation would throw the administration's budget substantially out of kilter.

They said they had also talked with the President about airport development and that Eisenhower is intent on holding the cost line in this field.

House GOP leader, CHARLES A. HALLECK, of Indiana, said the administration airport program will emphasize the safety of passengers. He added that such things as construction of tremendous terminals with fancy restaurants and bars is not contemplated under the administration program.

I have often wondered if the present occupants of the White House read the bills which they veto. Since this statement comes directly from the minority leader in the House after a conversation with the President, I am appalled at what appears to be complete ignorance of what was in the bill which was vetoed last year, or what is in the bill, S. 1, which I introduced this year with 44 other Senators. I quote from page 4, line 5 of the bill, S. 1, which is pending today, a provision identical to that in the bill which the President vetoed:

COSTS NOT ALLOWED

(b) With respect to amounts obligated after June 30, 1959, the cost of acquisition or construction of that part of a project intended for use as a passenger automobile parking facility, and the cost of construction of those parts of passenger or freight terminal buildings and other airport administrative buildings intended for use as bars, cocktail lounges, night clubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, or gamerooms or such other use which, in the opinion of the Administrator, is not essential to the welfare and safety of those persons using airports for public aviation purposes, shall not be an allowable project cost under this Act.

That is about as plain as English can be written. Yet we find the newly chosen House minority leader making the statement to which I have referred after coming from a conversation with the President who last year vetoed a bill with identical language, specifically ruling out such projects, and specifically placing the power in the administration's appointive Federal Aviation Administrator to rule out similar projects which are not essential to the welfare and safety of the public.

I feel that someone is not reading the bills which are vetoed. I feel that leaders in one body of the Congress have not informed themselves, or have not been properly informed by the Chief Executive.

The President's budget, which was sent to the Congress, recommended increased taxes on certain fuels. It seems to me that this recommendation is designed to prejudice and increase the cost of transportation in two fields—and two fields only—namely, aviation and automobile transport, including trucklines and buslines.

No tax penalty whatever is suggested with respect to railroads, which have been in the driver's seat for 6 long years in this administration, while aviation has been penalized. Now we find a proposal for new legislation increasing the tax on aviation gasoline from 2 cents to 4½ cents a gallon, and increasing the tax on jet fuel from zero to 4½ cents.

Jet fuels will be the basic fuels of tomorrow's aviation. Yet we have a proposal to increase the total cost of a gallon of jet fuel by almost 100 percent.

The proposal is poorly thought out. It has not been properly studied. The yield in a gallon of jet fuel, in terms of propulsion energy for an airplane, does not approach the yield of a gallon of high octane gas; but because of oversimplification, or a complete lack of knowledge of the facts, a uniform tax of four and a half cents a gallon is proposed on both jet fuels and aviation gasoline.

It seems significant that this record-breaking tax is proposed to be applied to aviation fuels. As I recall the Federal Aviation Administrator says that the cost of airline transportation would be increased by some 10 percent.

It is proposed to increase these taxes more and more, when the administration proposes to do less and less for aviation. While it is asking for increased taxes on aviation gas and jet fuel, the administration proposes to withdraw from the program which, over a reasonable period of time, would furnish the landing fields and airports so vitally necessary to air transportation.

It seems to me strange that this tax is being applied so as to discriminate against other forms of transportation, to the advantage of the railroads. However, favoritism on the part of this administration toward railroads is nothing new. As I have stated, it has existed for 6 long years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, before I say something about the sixth anniversary of the first inauguration of the President of the United States, I wish to make a brief comment on the observation made by my distinguished and scholarly friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

As I listened to the adjectives employed in the discussion I thought of the time when Noah Webster's wife caught him kissing the maid. His wife, seeing this osculatory performance, said, "Why, Noah, I'm surprised."

Mr. Webster said, "Oh, no, my dear, I am surprised; you are astonished."

So my good friend is astonished, he is surprised, he is shocked, he is appalled, and I believe he is bewildered, by the statement this morning with respect to the Federal-aid-to-airports bill.

However, I believe there are a great many people in the country who will not be appalled, who will not be shocked, who will not be bewildered, and who will not be astonished, if only we undertake to address ourselves a little to frugality and bring the national budget into balance.

I have referred to the budget as the national pocketbook. We cannot take anything out of it unless we put something in it. Every child knows that. I have seen little girls who received pocketbooks for Christmas. A little girl immediately opens the pocketbook to see what is in it. Something must be put into it first. So we put something in the pocketbook. If we undertake to remain within the limits of the pocketbook, we will have a little nestegg. That would be a pretty comfortable feeling for the years ahead.

The Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board made an extended trip through Europe. When he returned to this country he made a report. In the report he made two pointed observations. The first deals with the lack of confidence in the American dollar on the part of people who are intelligent and perceptive in other parts of the world.

Mr. President, when confidence abroad vanishes and confidence at home disappears, watch out. It is time, Mr. President, God willing—and I say it reverently—for us to separate the sheep from the goats. We are going to find out who the spenders are and who the people are who are dedicated to a sound and secure country.

We cannot spend the country rich. It has been tried before under the philosophy of John Maynard Keynes. I believe the greatest thing he ever said was, "In the long run, we will all be dead." He ought to know, because he is dead.

I did not want to make a speech on this subject at this time.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the distinguished minority leader having mentioned the sheep and goats, I wonder whether after studying the President's budget, he does not believe that Congress is being taken for a herd of goats. No one who has studied the President's budget figures and his "guesstimates," has any hope that Congress will levy additional consumer taxes in the amount of $600 million, or believes that the administration is today advocating a balanced budget. The budget cannot be balanced unless Congress is disposed to enact consumer taxes which bear heaviest on the workingman who, for example, must have gasoline to drive his car to work, and who must pay a 1-cent tax above the 4-cent cost of mailing a letter.

If a Democratic President had submitted the budget, it would have been out of balance, because we should not include as income what the President hopes Congress will enact by way of new taxes. Consequently it is nothing but fiction to say that it is a balanced budget. It will fool none except those who do not read carefully. The administration is not sending a balanced budget to Congress.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I had not intended to get into a budget discussion. I am saving my remarks for a later date. I may say to my good friend that the reference to sheep and goats has no personal connotation, and is a phrase we have often used in our comments. However, I shall come to grips with the subject with some vigor at a later date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S FIRST INAUGURATION

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, 6 years ago today Dwight Eisenhower became President.

The sovereign people chose him by the greatest majority ever given any man for that office.

Before election, he said, "Our single purpose is to serve their interests, guard and extend their rights, and strengthen the America we love."

Often in that 6-year period, he must have reflected upon the burdens which he assumed as the Nation's leader—burdens that no political piety and no partisan wit can obscure or minimize.

When he took office, death was still parading through the bunkers and over the hills and valleys of Korea.

Dignity and good manners had taken a holiday, and such terms as "liar," "snolly goster" were justified as a part of our political jargon.

Communists were a substantial problem in Government.

When people said, "I never had it so good," they carelessly forgot that prosperity, such as it was, was built on armament and young blood.

There was a mountain of unpaid bills.

Money taken from the people in the form of taxes was at an all-time peak.

The people's money was not enough to pay the current bills.

The budget, under which President Eisenhower had to operate the first year—prepared not by him and his associates, but by those who preceded him—called for spending nearly 10 billion more than what the Federal tax collector expected to take from people's pockets.

The farm program in force when Dwight Eisenhower crossed the White House threshold as President was calculated to fill Government storage bins with wheat and corn, cotton and tobacco, oils and fats, and dairy products in a few short months.

Hostilities in Europe had come to an end 8 years before, and yet there were no peace treaties with Austria and Germany.

The road ahead was a rough, painful, tortuous road to travel. It took courage and dedication. On this road, Dwight Eisenhower walked slowly, but he never walked backward.

There was a better stewardship of the people's money. They were able to keep more of it through a $7 billion reduction in taxes. More surpluses went abroad and to people at home, instead of being destroyed. The level of prices which people paid was held down.

The Nation got more security for less outlay. There was a steady, effective, and undramatic effort to improve the national security in every field.

The sadly neglected area of missiles and rocketry was promptly explored and zealously developed. There were no manufactured crises.

What might in other days have been permitted to stir national emotions into a crisis—Vietnam, Guatemala, Formosa, Berlin, Lebanon, Suez—were treated firmly, without theatrical trimmings.

A recession—rather well behind us now—was handled sensibly and sympathetically.

The ever deeper thrust of Government into private business was restrained and reversed.

For the first time in decades, civil rights received adequate and firm attention.

Over and above all was the healing force of a warm personality, restrained in language, dedicated in spirit, cognizant and abreast of progress, alert to danger, aware of national needs, and determined that human dignity and human freedom were priceless ends in themselves.

It takes 3 years to produce a head of beef. It takes 6 years to build a battleship. Yet in 6 years a Nation of 175 million people, with its complicated but efficient system of production and distribution, under the guidance of Dwight D. Eisenhower reoriented itself and was returned to the high road of expansion, balanced freedom, security, peace, and unlimited potential.

In that time, Dwight Eisenhower has been excoriated and assailed, but he was always restrained. He was maligned, but his character shone as a sufficient answer. He was frequently vilified, but answered vilification with humility and meekness. He was often assailed, but he remembered that he was the leader of a great moral Nation.

Through it all, Dwight Eisenhower has stood like a rock, composed, firm, dignified, and worthy of the leadership which he afforded this Nation.

If those who continue to shout about leadership had simply permitted themselves a little followership of the President, who has provided the roadmap which will take this country to new levels of contentment, prosperity, peace, and the expanded enjoyment of living, the progress of the people would have been even greater.

Truly, Dwight Eisenhower has done a good work on this favored land.

For the next 730 days he will still be—God willing, and may we pray for him—and I pray for him—the President of the United States. Seven hundred thirty days is a long time in a world where events move so swiftly. In that time and under his benign and dedicated guidance, the Nation can move fast and far on the road of solvency, security, freedom, and the discharge of the proper and legitimate functions of Government.

We salute Dwight Eisenhower as a great public servant for work magnificently done.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I congratulate the minority leader upon his address. I wholeheartedly join with him in paying tribute to the President of the United States for his 6 years of constructive leadership in the White House. In addition, I wish for the President many more years of service to our Nation—including the next two in the White House—as well as personal well-being and happiness.

Few men in our history have given the country such long and distinguished service as has Dwight D. Eisenhower. Certainly no one—military leader and President—has served in more complex and challenging times.

During his term of office, President Eisenhower has provided the Nation with constructive leadership, as has been so well said by the minority leader. I shall have more to say about that in a moment.

For the most part, I have considered it a privilege to support most of the President's programs. True, there have been times when I have differed with him. We recognize that no two thinking men can, at all times, on every issue, reach the same conclusion or agree on every issue.

Overall, the President has provided us with what America needs most: a commonsense, realistic, middle-of-the-road kind of leadership, in striving for peace in a troubled world and in preparing forward-looking programs for domestic progress.

We recognize that there are those who feel that attempting to chart a middle-of-the-road course in difficult times is choosing the easy way. I do not agree with that conclusion. Such a feeling is far from the truth.

Designing and adhering to such a program takes vision, patience, and a realistic willingness to be "shot at" verbally, politically, and otherwise, by the extremists, both from the left and the right, not only from the opposite party, but, at times, from one's own party.

The President has demonstrated courage, steadfastness, and resoluteness in adhering to the support of such programs for the Nation. I deeply respect him for it.

As we read the newspapers, we are cognizant of the fact that wherever the President goes the people trust him. They know he is honest and reliable. Why? Because they know he is one of them. He is one who has great faith in God and great faith in his beloved America.

The philosophy of the President is best expressed in his own words as "liberal in its human concern, conservative in its economic proposals, constructive, dynamic, and optimistic in its appraisal of the future."

During his Presidency, President Eisenhower has helped our Nation to write a chapter of progress, of which we and posterity can be justly proud.

As we look toward the future, I reiterate my deep respect for his long record of outstanding service. I wish for him a future bright with satisfaction in service and personal health and happiness.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, on the sixth anniversary of the first inauguration of Dwight D. Eisenhower as President of the United States, I join with my distinguished colleagues in expressing appreciation for the service of this illustrious American as our Chief Executive.

During the past 6 years, Mr. Eisenhower has worked with Republicans and Democrats alike in his sincere efforts to preserve peace with honor, and a prosperity based on expanding living standards, rather than bloodshed.

He has served conscientiously and with dignity, in the realization that his office represents many of the greatest traditions and the most fervent aspirations of our Nation.

Dwight Eisenhower has been a most capable, outstanding Executive, and a great leader of a great people.

We thank him for his service to our country.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, upon the conclusion of the sixth year of our great President in office and the beginning of his seventh year, I wish to speak about the debt and the obligation which I feel the people of this country owe to him.

It seems to me that Dwight Eisenhower has brought to the Presidency a dignity and a quality which has been lacking in this country for many years. In all the course of the trying times which he has had in the last 6 years, I think it is to be noted by us and by the American people that not once has he raised his voice in arraying class against class, group against group, or partisan against partisan. But in it all he has spoken to Americans, as he was speaking for all Americans.

Mr. President, during these years he has been troubled with many great problems. I think of some of them which have arisen during my short tenure in the Senate: The first Quemoy matter, the Egyptian matter, the Far East matter, the Arab matter. And I think of the Berlin matter and of the Korean war. In all these matters—which he did not create; instead, either they existed before he came into office, or the factors leading to their development were already in existence—he has acted boldly and forthrightly for all of us.

There are those who have disagreed with him, and there are those who will disagree with him in the future. But one thing which I believe all of us can say on this anniversary is that he has represented the United States in all these troublesome areas and in all these troublesome times with constant progress, with his mind constantly upon the ideal of self-government, not only for ourselves, but also for all the rest of the entire world, and at no time has he stooped to personalities or to small approaches to these problems.

Mr. President, even though President Eisenhower had difficult personal times from a health standpoint during one period of his Presidency, even then his leadership shone forth like the true light the President of the United States should provide.

On this anniversary I say that all Americans owe him a great debt of gratitude for standing up, in his leadership—with others, when possible; alone, when necessary—with a complete and selfless devotion to the three coordinate branches of our Government, and to the Constitution upon which our Government is based.

So, Mr. President, on this occasion I am happy to join my colleagues in paying tribute to President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, 6 years is a long time—long enough to take the measure of a man.

I congratulate the President upon this sixth anniversary. They have been 6 important years in the history of the American Republic.

There are many points upon which the President and I have differences. I believe he knows those points. I have never been reticent in advancing them or telling him of my feelings.

But our differences are accompanied by a warm, personal affection upon my part. And they are also accompanied by respect for his devotion to his country, and to his great patriotism.

I have never believed that it is the business of the opposition to oppose. I have believed that it is the business of the opposition to advance constructive alternatives when such alternatives are indicated.

I have never hesitated to support the President when I thought he was right.

The real genius of our democracy is that we have means, other than bullets and bayonets, of resolving our political differences.

Again, I congratulate the President and his lovely and gracious wife upon this anniversary. I hope—and my hope is warm—that they are looking forward to many more years of happiness.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARTKE in the chair). The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to add a few words of tribute to those which already have been spoken about our President, Dwight D. Eisenhower.

In January 1951, it was my pleasure to decide to support him as a candidate for election to high office. I have never regretted the decision I made at that time.

I admired him for his leadership of our Armed Forces abroad, and later as the leader of the NATO forces, and later as the president of Columbia University.

During the past 6 years of his service, I have had the honor of meeting with him approximately once every week while Congress has been in session. All of us who participate in those meetings are impressed by his sincerity of purpose in attempting to obtain greater security for the United States and a more peaceful world. In those discussions I have never heard a word of partisanship or anything except concern with opportunities to develop a more peaceful world.

He has had the confidence and friendship of perhaps more leaders in the world than has any other man in the history of our country.

So we have been fortunate in having him lead us at this difficult time. During his entire period of service he has endeavored to obtain a better and a more peaceful world.

On domestic issues, I have heard him ask, countless times, "What is right? What is best?"—not "What is politically advantageous?" Instead, he constantly is asking, "What is right and best for the great majority of our people?"

President Eisenhower is a good family man. He has a fine son and a fine daughter-in-law and four fine grandchildren. He wants for this country a better opportunity for the young people who are coming along to lead a happier and more useful life and a more peaceful life than he has had.

So, Mr. President, I say we may congratulate ourselves upon his work during the last 6 years; and we wish to him 2 more years of good service as the leader of our great country, in giving all of us a better opportunity for world peace and a better opportunity to live happily in this great land of ours.

Mr. CARLSON. I desire to yield to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH].

Mr. BUSH. I thank the acting minority leader.

Mr. President, I am happy to join in the tributes of the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and my other colleagues upon this anniversary of the inauguration of President Eisenhower.

Dwight D. Eisenhower has been a great President. He is distinguished for many remarkable characteristics—but most of all, I believe, for being wholly conscientious in the performance of his duties. He has never attempted to fool the American people at any time. I challenge those who are critical of him to assert with any degree of correctness that he has ever attempted to deceive or fool the American people up to this very minute. I think that is why, throughout the 6 years, he has held so high a measure of approval amongst the people of the United States, and why even today he holds such a large measure of respect and affection among all of our people.

Mr. President, this anniversary comes at a time when the President has just submitted his budget for the next fiscal year. We have heard some attacks of a political nature upon that budget. I should like to observe that, from my own knowledge, I doubt that any President has ever worked harder on his own budget than President Eisenhower has worked on the budget which he just sent to the Congress yesterday.

The President has sent his budget to Congress at a very critical time, perhaps the most critical peacetime year in the history of the Nation. He sent the budget to Congress at a time when the credit of the Government of the United States is a matter, for the first time, of some suspicion in the far parts of the world.

I was very much impressed with a speech by William McChesney Martin, of the Federal Reserve Board, after he returned from a trip around the world recently. He said, in a speech in Chicago, which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that he noticed, in the Far East, amongst some of the countries we are trying to help and have been trying to help, a growing suspicion about the soundness of the American dollar.

Mr. President, I have said before, and I say on this anniversary, that the credit of the United States is the most important single bulwark of defense of the free world today. I am satisfied the President of the United States knows that. It is because he believes it so sincerely that he has taken up the fight for fiscal soundness of this Government with a determination that I do not recall any other President has ever taken into such a fight.

The service of President Eisenhower has taken place in a period when we have been almost constantly in danger. During the remaining 2 years of his term this danger may increase.

Criticism has been made at times of the President's foreign policy, which I do not think has varied too much from that of the preceding administration, but in many respects has been very similar. Those who have made attacks upon the foreign policy should pause and bear in mind that foreign policy today must be made under tremendous difficulties, under constant threats, and in the face of an enmity which this country has never confronted before in our history.

So I believe President Eisenhower has measured up, in these 6 years, to the expectations of the American people. I hope that his strength may hold in the remaining two years of his term, so that he may continue to render the honest, patriotic, and devoted services to our people which have characterized these past 6 years.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I am very glad to join with those who have spoken previously, on both sides of the aisle, in congratulating the Chief Executive of our country as he enters his seventh year in the White House.

It will be a lasting mark of the dedication of Dwight Eisenhower that, emerging from the war as one of our great heroes, acquiring a brilliant reputation as an educator in this country, he agreed to become the candidate for President of the political party to which I belong. Thereafter, as a result of a vigorous and grueling campaign, he entered upon the office in as severe a time as our country has ever known, or, indeed, as has ever been known in all recorded history.

The Members of the Senate, like men and women in the country, will disagree on occasion with some of the policies which have been laid down and which are likely to be followed by the present administration, but there is no American, in or out of Government, who cannot but salute a dedicated American leader who has worked devotedly and patiently for peace with honor, not alone for his country and for his fellow citizens, but for all the nations of the globe.

I am very glad, therefore, to say, in common with my colleagues in the Senate and with my fellow citizens in the country, "Godspeed to the President of the United States. Good health and long life, and in the 2 years which remain of his term, may all success crown his efforts."

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, today marks the end of Mr. Eisenhower's 6 years as President of the United States. During that time he has personified to a unique degree the desire and hope of the American people, indeed people everywhere, for peace.

The earnestness of his striving, the sincerity of his efforts, cannot be questioned. He has worked patiently and determinedly even under the most trying circumstances. He has refused to be intimidated, and at the same time he has allowed nothing to discourage him from further efforts to reach peaceful resolution of the many critical problems confronting the world.

Nothing is more typical of the man and his endeavor than the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency. First put forward by the President in a speech to the United Nations, the proposal so captured the imagination of nations all over the world that the Soviet Union found it desirable to give up its initial opposition to it.

It is his concern in this kind of constructive international action that has made President Eisenhower the great symbol of peace throughout the world. There may be differences on domestic policy among us; there may be varying views on details of the emphases involved in our foreign programs and international policies. But surely we are all one in support of that unremitting search for the achievement of lasting peace to which the President has dedicated himself.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues in their observance of the sixth anniversary of Dwight Eisenhower's first inauguration as President of the United States. I think it can be truly said that these have been the best 6 years for the American people in their history.

During this over half decade beginning with January of 1953, more Americans have earned and kept better wages and incomes than in any other like period of time since the founding of this Republic.

As Americans, we have grown so accustomed to peace, plenty, and prosperity under the leadership of President Eisenhower that we fail to remember some of the problems preceding his administration.

Preceding the time President Eisenhower took office, a great majority of the American people—Democrats and Republicans alike—had lost faith in the honesty, integrity, and reliability of those who served them in government.

I think I should mention that today the world is at peace. Here at home the gross national product, personal income, consumer expenditures, individual assets and scores of other economic indicators are at alltime highs. A boom year is predicted for 1959.

All of this has been achieved without the stimulus of a shooting war. Right now Americans are at work building more, earning more, saving more, buying more, and investing more than at any time during previous administrations.

The unparalleled record of peace, progress, and prosperity during the 6 years of the Eisenhower administration is the best evidence that it has met the problems of the past and that it can and will solve those of today and tomorrow.

Others have discussed the achievements of this administration and history will record the accomplishments, but I want to mention the human side of President Eisenhower.

The President has stated on several occasions that he is liberal when it comes to dealing with human problems and conservative in regard to material things.

His background and his very nature as an individual make it easy for him to have a personal interest in the problems that are closest to the hearts of our citizens.

In the January 19 issue of the Topeka Daily Capital there was published the following editorial, entitled "The Human Side of Ike" which I shall read into the RECORD:

There never has been a President who hasn't had his critics of all kinds—little critics, big critics, hot critics, cold critics, and, of course, numerous critics.

Dwight Eisenhower, being President, automatically qualifies for any kind of criticism his fellow citizens, and also those abroad, throw his way.

But Presidents have personalities, even as do their critics, and if some of our Chief Executives have been reticent and forbidding and extremely formal in their appearances, certainly Mr. Eisenhower isn't one of them.

The intensely human side of the President was shown in Washington this week when he appeared before the National Press Club. His visit to the club came at a time when Capital newsmen had been complaining loudly about infrequency of White House press conferences and criticizing Mr. Eisenhower for being aloof from the country in the Executive Mansion.

But when President Eisenhower stood up before the club and invited questioning from his audience, he was Ike Eisenhower and playing that warming role to the hilt. If his audience had been critical in days past, they were won over, at least for the time being, by the warmth and the high good humor of the President.

The President had his serious words, too, but he spoke them with intense sincerity. Then, accepting a card attesting to his membership in the press club, he cracked: "I hope it is true that members of the press deal gently with their own members. So, I hope that possession of this card gives me a certain immunity that, up to this moment, has not been mine."

That's the human side of Ike Eisenhower, the side that has won him respect, if not political agreement, in the past. It's a side, we believe, that the public would like to see more often.

No administration has kept its promises more faithfully than the Eisenhower administration. No administration has done a better job for all the people than this administration.

Finally, never have the American people had more reason to be grateful for the leadership of a President than they have for President Eisenhower's today.

JOHN S. ARMSTRONG

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, a longtime friend of mine and a fellow Rotarian, John S. Armstrong, 92-year-old nurseryman of Ontario, Calif., was the subject of a writeup in the September 1958 issue of Success Unlimited, a Chicago magazine.

Mr. Armstrong has made an outstanding success in his business and deserves a memorial for the great contribution he has made to American beauty. Through his plant propagation and nursery activities, he has played a major role in beautifying the Western Coastal States and the Southwest. I understand that his rose creations have won more all-American awards than have the roses of any other breeder in the world.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the article "He Made His Own Bed of Roses," by William L. Roper.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HE MADE HIS OWN BED OF ROSES

(By William L. Roper)

(John S. Armstrong, once sick and broke, achieved health and wealth through hard work as founder of southern California's famed Armstrong Nurseries where many of our most beautiful types of roses have been developed.)

Nearly 70 years have passed since John S. Armstrong, then a 23-year-old Canadian youth with a tubercular cough and $6, arrived in Ontario, Calif., to seek his health and fortune.

He found both.

Today, clear eyed and mentally alert at 92, he is a legendary symbol of success in southern California, and is widely known throughout the United States and Canada as founder of the famous Armstrong Nurseries.

His Armstrong rose creations have won more All-America awards than the roses of any other breeder in the world. Yet roses represent only one phase of his achievement. Through his plant propagation and nursery activities, he has played a major role in making southern California a place of rare beauty.

How did he do it? Why do some men succeed while others, apparently equally gifted, fail?

One reason, as Napoleon Hill pointed out years ago in his book, "Think and Grow Rich," is that in order to make the most of your life, you must look ahead, see your big opportunity, find your life's purpose—in a field you enjoy and for which you are adapted.

That is exactly what John Armstrong did.

And his story clearly demonstrates the tremendous power of applied creative thinking in overcoming difficulties and making a dream come true.

Born in Sheffield, Ontario, Canada, on October 11, 1865, the son of Joseph and Eliza Bell Armstrong, both immigrants from North Ireland, he left school at 14 to learn the cabinet trade. But after more than 6 years in cabinet shops and 2 years with an organ manufacturing company, young Armstrong became ill with tuberculosis, aggravated by the walnut dust in the organ factory.

If ever a case of tuberculosis could be referred to as a blessing, it was in Armstrong's case. If he hadn't contracted the disease, he might have gone on as an obscure cabinetmaker. The ailment, however, changed his entire life, causing him to move to California where he entered a completely new field and won fame and fortune.

"My doctor advised me to go either to Florida or California," Armstrong explained. "Recalling Horace Greeley's advice, 'Go West, young man,' I decided to go to California.

"To get money for the trip, I had to sell my ornate, cathedral design clockcase, which I'd made during my spare time. It was made of six kinds of wood and I prized it very highly. But I sold it to one of the men in the organ factory for $35."

Fifteen years later, he returned to Canada and repurchased the clock. It is now one of his most precious possessions, because it provided him with his first stake—the money to move to California. He arrived in Ontario, Calif., on March 3, 1889.

"I had exactly $6 in my pocket. But I was 23 and full of ambition," Armstrong added. "Riding down Euclid Avenue from the Santa Fe station on the old mule car on a bright, sunny morning, and observing the ripe oranges on the young trees, I felt like throwing my hat in the air and exclaiming, 'Eureka! I have found it.'"

A few hours of futile job hunting brought him face to face with the realities of his predicament. Business was at a standstill. Jobs were scarce. Southern California was in a severe depression, the preliminary phase of the panic that was later to sweep the Nation. In the fall of 1887, the great southern California land boom had collapsed, and about the only activity in the Ontario area—east of Los Angeles—was the planting of orange trees that were brought from Florida in carload lots.

Armstrong took the only available job—that of porter in the Ontario Hotel—until the weather turned warm. Then he camped in the canyon above the city to regain his health, and got a job with a nursery that was just being started. His salary was $1.25 a day.

A few weeks later he found his services at the nursery were no longer required.

His next job was as a carpenter at $1.50 a day, building houses for curing lemons. Yet as soon as the nursery business began to pick up he made another momentous decision. He gave up carpentry to return to work in the nursery for 25 cents a day less.

"I'd liked nursery work and I saw a future in it, which carpenter work did not offer," he said. "I had noted the vastness of California's as yet unplanted acreage. Most of the surrounding land was either in barley fields or untilled desert covered with sagebrush and other wild growth.

"I became convinced there was a promising future in nursery products, and, aside from the commercial aspect, I found the work pleasant."

Realizing that he'd never get rich working for $1.25 a day, Armstrong began growing nursery stock of his own. When his employers learned of this home enterprise, they suggested that he either sell them his stock or buy them out.

Armstrong decided to do neither. He started in business for himself.

Under the name of Armstrong Nurseries, his business prospered. He took advantage of the rapidly increasing demand for eucalyptus and Monterey cypress, then badly needed for windbreaks, and grew 100,000 of each the second year of his business career. Thus, by anticipating the market demand, proceeding imaginatively but with caution, keeping careful records of all transactions, and displaying exceptional personal initiative in advertising, he forged ahead of all competition in his area. His first catalog brought hm $600 in mail orders.

As his business grew and his health returned, he took on additional personal responsibilities. In 1896 he returned to Canada and married Charlotte Cooper. Meanwhile, he became an American citizen and brought his widowed mother and his younger brothers and sisters to California.

Now he leased additional acreage and planted a variety of nursery stock, always prudently specializing in those trees and shrubs most in demand. Still it wasn't easy or without risk of disaster. One cold night, a severe frost destroyed nearly 17,000 orange, lemon, and grapefruit trees almost ready for the market. Then, one summer, both he and his wife came down with typhoid fever. In time, they recovered. His nursery business continued to grow. He had wisely invested in acreage for growing nursery stock. With southern California's astounding population growth, his real estate trebled, and retrebled in value. Also with the growth came an ever-expanding demand for ornamental trees and shrubbery.

Again foreseeing the opportunity, he pioneered in the development of new varieties of roses, several of which have become world famous. His Charlotte Armstrong rose, named after his first wife who died in 1947 following an automobile accident, is one of the best known. More than 2 million of this variety have been sold.

In 1950, Mr. Armstrong married Mrs. Willa W. Bradley, who shares his love of roses, travel, and music. They reside in a beautiful Ontario tract which he developed as Armsley Square several years ago. A few years ago the Pacific Coast Association of Nurserymen named him as the outstanding nurseryman of the coast. He also has the distinction of being one of the oldest Rotarians in the United States. His son, John A., and two grandsons, John, junior, and David, now carry on the business. But they still call on the fabulous John S., who is bright eyed and alert, for occasional advice.

What is his advice to the young man or woman today?

"Try to find work that offers you the best opportunity for achievement in line with your talents, and be sure that it's something you enjoy doing," he advises. "Think, plan, don't let yourself get frozen in a rut."

He said he believes it very important to have a positive mental attitude and a definite purpose, and that the habit of "going the extra mile" pays in the long run.

"For example," he explained, "I once promised to sell a citrus grower a shipment of orange trees. At the time, the trees were selling for $1 a tree. But in the meantime, a shortage developed and the price rose to $2.50 each. However, I kept faith with him and myself by letting him have the trees for $1 a tree.

"This caused me a substantial loss at the time, but it paid off in future goodwill."

He is also a firm believer in self-reliance and self-discipline. "Too many persons want something given to them," he said. "They should be willing to work for what they want. The big prizes aren't won by just wishing for them."

Regarding self-discipline, he said he had been forced to give up clarinet playing during his younger days because it was taking too much of his time. "I never read fiction for the same reason," he declared. "I didn't have the time. I did read books on horticulture and agriculture."

He rates enthusiasm high and said he considers a pleasing personality of primary importance.

Yet, in summing up all the factors that are involved in winning success, he places emphasis upon one element that is never too popular. It is work.

"In the early stages of the nursery business," he explains, "I worked 12 to 14 hours a day, or almost from daylight to dark, and found it no hardship.

"I always worked 10 hours a day in the organ factory in Canada, but I found time to make my ornate clock during my leisure hours. It was that clock that gave me my start. And it means something very important to me—the value of time.

"That is one of the first lessons we all need to learn."

EQUALIZATION OF PAY OF RETIRED MEMBERS OF UNIFORMED SERVICES

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, the bill, S. 269, which the distinguished Senator from Arizona introduced on January 14, and which I was pleased to cosponsor, is one which I hope the Congress will favorably consider during the present session. The purpose of the bill is very simple. Its enactment would reestablish in the case of personnel of the uniformed services retired prior to June 1, 1958, the authority to compute their pay on the current pay scales. In so doing, it would remove the feeling of disillusionment caused both active and retired officers and men by the enactment of one of the provisions in Public Law 85–422, which became effective on June 1, 1958.

Prior to enactment of this law, the general rule was that the pay of retired members of the uniformed services was automatically increased to correspond to that of active-duty personnel whenever their pay was increased. Only once in nearly 100 years has the Congress varied even for a short time from this principle. Soon thereafter the deviation was corrected, thus emphasizing the intent of Congress to adhere to such a principle. I also want to emphasize the fact that for many years military personnel have felt every right to rely upon a continuance of this relationship between active-duty pay and retired pay. Career personnel have planned their whole future based upon this consideration. Departure from this cardinal principle constitutes a major step in the direction of destroying the incentive to make a career of the armed services.

The Cordiner committee made an exhaustive study and report which formed the basis for enactment of Public Law 85–422. That committee strongly recommended maintaining the old principle of gearing retired pay to active-duty pay. The report stated that this principle was a "mandatory and essential feature" of its recommendations. The report further stated that "to depart from this principle would not only break faith with the individual retired, but would have a more serious and adverse effect upon the retention rates of personnel currently on active duty."

The vast majority of personnel presently discriminated against by Public Law 85–422 served in World War II. A sizable number also served in World War I. In addition, some of these served in the Korean conflict as well as in both World Wars. It is doubtful that many officers and men retired after June 1, 1958, will serve their country in positions of such critical responsibility as those previously retired. I submit there is no justice in two pay scales for equal merit and equal service.

The cost involved in this bill would be less than $30 million for the first year and would steadily decrease and ultimately disappear altogether. Regardless of the cost, however, I submit that we cannot afford to take any other position than to equalize the pay between the older officers and men and the more recently retired ones. This is a very simple proposition involving a matter of justice and equity only. The question of honorable procedure is the sole principle to be considered.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I should like to say that the Government should stand by the terms of the law under which these officers and men have been serving and grant them the retired pay agreed upon. We should not break faith with the career personnel who have devoted their lives to the defense of our country.

It is my earnest hope that the Armed Services Committee will give early consideration to S. 269.

COMMENDATION OF SENATOR SMATHERS FOR REFUSAL OF INVITATION TO VISIT CUBA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as reported in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald, the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] made what I consider to be a very fine statement in setting out his reasons for declining an invitation to go to Havana and be an an observer at a so-called trial and at a public demonstration. I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Washington Post and Times Herald dealing with the statement of the Senator from Florida be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DELAY JUDGING CASTRO, SMATHERS SUGGESTS

Senator GEORGE SMATHERS, Democrat, of Florida, has urged his colleagues and the public to reserve judgment on the Cuban revolution until events more clearly show what has happened there.

SMATHERS, a longtime close observer of Latin American affairs and representative of the State closest to Cuba, has kept silent, while others first acclaimed Fidel Castro as a George Washington and then denounced his speedy executions of Batista adherents as a "blood bath."

SMATHERS broke silence long enough to praise the State Department's "proper restraint" and to ask others to stand back until the smoke clears.

SMATHERS said he had first heard of Castro 11 years ago and has heard enough about him since to "reserve judgment on him." The Senator said there was no question either of Castro's courage and love of country, or of his youth, inexperience, and the "dubious reputations" of some of his past associates.

It was too early when Castro was winning the underdog's fight, and is still too early to tell whether the revolution was a victory for freedom or simply a change in dictatorships, SMATHERS said.

He suggested that instead of making "belligerent assertions," Americans should hope and pray for a "happy salvation" for Cuba, leave diplomatic relations to the State Department, and keep quiet for the time being.

SMATHERS and several other Senators said they had turned down Castro's invitation to go to Havana for a firsthand look.

Senator WAYNE MORSE, Democrat, of Oregon, one of the sharpest critics of Castro's speedy trials, who also turned down an invitation, called on Castro to invite a United Nations team of observers.

Representative ADAM C. POWELL, Democrat, of New York, who has said he had worked "hand in glove" with the Castro movement for several months, announced that he planned to accept a similar invitation and go to Cuba.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it will be noted, as Senators read the statements of the Senator from Florida, that he urged restraint and he urged some reservation of final judgment with respect to the policies of the new regime in Cuba. I associate myself with those observations.

I point out, Mr. President, that is exactly what the Secretary of State did some days ago when, at his press conference, when questioned in regard to the sad developments in Cuba, he said in effect it was his hope that freedom, liberty, and justice would be the democratic principles which would characterize the actions of the new regime. That is restraint.

In my judgment, the same spirit of restraint characterized the remarks of the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Rubottom, in charge of the Latin American desk, following the meeting of the Senate Subcommittee on Latin American Relations, at which he testified. He made a statement leaving no room for doubt that it was the point of view of the officials of our Government that the democratic procedures of a fair judicial process should prevail in Cuba.

Likewise, in keeping with an attitude of restraint, some of us who are members of the Latin American Relations Committee of the Senate have from time to time issued statements in regard to the unhappy situation which has prevailed in Cuba in respect to firing squad executions. We have tried to make perfectly clear that, as representatives of a free people and as members of a committee which has direct foreign policy interests in connection with the affairs of Latin America, we plead for the application of the moral law to the handling of trials conducted by the new administration in Cuba. Of course, the moral law calls for fairness, for an opportunity to be heard in one's defense, and for the right of counsel. It calls for adequate time to prepare one's defense. It calls for a cooling of public emotions.

Some of us, including the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], to whom I have already referred, received a cablegram yesterday from General Castro, and from a Mr. Jorge Quintana, president of the Cuban News Reporters Association, inviting us to come to Cuba on Wednesday—tomorrow—to witness a war-criminal trial, and also a mass demonstration of 1 million Cuban men and women in front of the Presidential Palace, supposedly in support of speedy executions of arrested leaders of the Batista regime.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a copy of the cablegram which I received, extending the invitation to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the cablegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On behalf Jorge Quintana, president, Cuban News Reporters Association, and Fidel Castro you are invited to Cuba to witness war criminal trial and also gathering of 1 million Cuban men, women in front of Presidential Palace Wednesday, January 21, 1959. Cuban Air Force planes will be available New York, Washington, and Miami, to bring you to Havana. You will be guest Cuban News Reporters Association. Please confirm by cable, Cuban Embassy, Washington, soonest if you or your representative will be able to attend. Also where you wish to be picked up.

FIDEL CASTRO.
JORGE QUINTANA.

Mr. MORSE. I replied to that invitation by respectfully declining it. I said:

I appreciate your invitation to visit Cuba next Wednesday to witness war criminal trial and Cuban mass meeting. I respectfully decline your invitation and in keeping with my sincere friendship for Cuba suggest that you use your good offices to have Cuban Government invite United Nations to send official observers to Cuba to observe and report to the world the procedures which have been followed by the new regime in past executions and those procedures that are followed in connection with future executions.

As a visitor to Cuba I would not have any official standing but I should think that the Cuban Government would welcome the presence of an official party representing the United Nations.

Let me make very clear that I think the criminals of the Batista regime should be brought to justice; but a quickly imposed sentence to death before a firing squad ordered by a so-called military trial at a time of high tension immediately following a successful revolt is not compatible with civilized justice.

My plea has been for orderly trials before civilian courts with adequate time for thorough preparation of both prosecution and defense and full public disclosure of the evidence that establishes the guilt. Such a procedure would strengthen the respect of world opinion for Cuban justice. It would leave no room for doubt about the determination of the leaders of the new Cuban Government to administer a government by law in whose courts both the innocent and the guilty are guaranteed fair procedure essential to a fair trial. Justice based upon a spirit of vengeance is justice defiled. It is not a demonstration by way of a mass meeting that Cuba needs but a rededication to the spiritual significance of the Mass. This is no time for a display of political drama but a time for the leaders of the Cuban Government to demonstrate to all of us who have been their friends and want to continue to be their friends that fair trial procedures for which the new President of Cuba has so nobly stood in the past will henceforth prevail under his administration.

The cablegram I sent to Mr. Quintana and General Castro summarizes, as best I can, my point of view, which I have expressed heretofore in the same friendly spirit and with the same restraint on the floor of the Senate. It is necessary to keep the record straight, because there have been some reports out of Cuba to the effect that fair procedure trials were held prior to the early executions in Cuba after Castro took over.

As chairman of the Latin American Relations Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, I say that I know, as a matter of fact, that in some instances that was not the case. To the contrary, certain members of the Batista regime—true, known to be men with a sordid record of cruelty, murder, and bloodshed behind them—were not subjected to any trial in the true meaning of the term but within a relatively few minutes after they were brought before military officers, were shot by a firing squad.

Of course, the substitution of tyranny for tyranny does not beget democracy. The sad thing about tyrannical procedures is that they feed the flames of more tyranny. So, as a friend of Cuba

I protested such inhumanity to man. As I have said before, I am one who was among the first in the Senate to protest support of Batista. I am one who, time and time again, on the floor of the Senate, in committee, and across the country, protested any Government assistance to the Batista regime. I pointed out that it was an out-and-out police-state regime, adopting police-state methods, one of which is the liquidation of opposition. Of course, I need make no explanation whatsoever for raising my voice in protest at the adoption by the new regime in Cuba in the early days of its existence of an execution procedure which was also based upon the sordid policy of inhumanity to man.

So my plea to the new Cuban administration as a lawyer, my plea as a Senator, and my plea as a responsible official of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, has been, "All you need to do is follow fair trial procedures, and you will win again the support of free men and women everywhere."

I now proceed to an argument by analogy, but an analogy so applicable to the situation in Cuba that I express the respectful hope that Cuba will follow it. The new President of Cuba is a great judge. The new President of Cuba is a man whose record as a lawyer and as a judge satisfies me that he understands the importance of fair procedures. He knows that the guilty as well as the innocent are entitled to fair procedures, and he knows, also, that frequently, in the absence of fair trial procedures, it is easy to make a mistake and execute someone who, in fact, is not guilty. All lawyers know that great danger.

That is why in our country one of the most basic principles of our system of self-government, for which our forefathers fought in the Revolutionary War, as they protested the star chamber procedures of English injustice, which in those days was imposed upon our forebearers, is the cardinal principle, which since the birth of our Nation we have demonstrated to the world, that men really cannot be free unless the trial procedures which determine innocence and guilt are fair.

The new President of Cuba knows that. Therefore I hope that under his statesmanship Cuba will proceed not with political drama in connection with executions but will put into practice those elementary safeguards which are essential to fair trial procedure.

We have discussed them in the Senate, and we have taken action on them in the Senate in connection with the Geneva Convention, in which we bound the United States to a code of morality in dealing with prisoners of war.

I said I was making an argument by analogy. Let me say at once, for the benefit of the press, that the Geneva Convention does not apply, as a matter of international law, to the revolt in Cuba. The Geneva Convention, a solemn treaty to which the signatories thereto are bound, applies to prisoners of war taken in the course of a war between nations.

However, we adopted the fair trial procedures of the Geneva Convention. Why? Because we recognized that if we are to keep faith with moral and spiritual values in the relations between nations we must repudiate any doctrine for handling prisoners of war which is based on the jungle law of vengeance. We recognized that the adoption of fair trial procedures to be applied to cases involving prisoners of war are essential to the administration of justice.

I respectfully say, if these are accepted by civilized nations as the rules of procedure which ought to prevail in the handling of the adjudication of cases involving prisoners of war taken from another country, not of one's own nationality, it is all the more important that they be followed when dealing with people of one's own country in connection with the aftermath of a civil war. That is why I say that this argument by analogy in reference to the Geneva Convention has great bearing upon the Cuban situation.

What did the Senate of the United States join in doing when we ratified the Geneva Convention? We joined in a convention—some of which I shall insert in the RECORD in a moment—which contains articles 105 and 106.

We guaranteed, first, to a prisoner of war qualified counsel. Second, we guaranteed him the right to call witnesses. Third, we guaranteed the services of an interpreter, if necessary. Fourth, we guaranteed that defense counsel is to have a period of 2 weeks before the trial to prepare his case, and that he is to be furnished the necessary facilities for this purpose.

I wish to stress that point. If we wish to guarantee justice, we must see to it that the accused are protected from hasty trials. It never has borne any weight with me to read dispatches from Cuban officials to the effect that if the Cuban leaders had not ordered hasty executions, the people would have taken the law into their own hands. That is but a confession that they were not able to maintain law and order. However, I do not believe the alibi. It is not fair to the Cuban people. It was a great challenge to the statesmanship and leadership which rested upon the shoulders of the Cuban leaders immediately after the revolt became successful. Prisons were still standing. The remarkable thing is, to the everlasting credit of Cuba, that the press was open and that television and radio channels were open, and that mediums of information were maintained, as they still are today. I believe that if the President of Cuba and General Castro and others had made clear to the people of Cuba that the criminals of the Batista regime would be brought to justice and that the legal penalties of the law of the land would be applied against them after the establishment of their guilt in fair, open, and public trials, the people of Cuba would have understood and approved. What is more, the people of the world who believe in freedom would have applauded.

It is not too late. In each one of the statements I have made I have said, "It is not too late." We want to be friends of the new leadership of Cuba. I believe the leaders are democratically motivated. When a wrong develops, steps should be taken to correct the wrong. Therefore, I call their attention to the fact that the Geneva convention even provides for a 2-week period for preparation of the prosecution and defense in the handling of a war-prisoner trial.

Fifth, we guaranteed by the Geneva convention that defense counsel may also confer with the accused in private and with the defense witnesses. Sixth, we assured that particulars of the charge against the accused are to be communicated to him and to his counsel in good time before the opening of the trial. Seventh, we guaranteed that the accused shall have the right of appeal in the same manner as the members of the armed forces of the detaining power.

Mr. President, that Geneva convention, I respectfully submit, is a recognition on the part of the civilized nations of the world that even the trial or the treatment of war prisoners must follow these basic safeguards of fair trial procedure.

Oh, but it is said in Cuba, according to some of the dispatches: What about the record of the United States concerning the German war criminals? I reply: What about it? As an American, with pride I point to that record, because it is a glorious record in support of fair trial procedure for the protection of both the innocent and the guilty. Sincere men and women may disagree as to whether the German war criminals should have been prosecuted. It was determined as a matter of public policy, on the part of the governments concerned, that the trials should be held. They were held in accordance with established principles of international law.

We sent from this country some of our most outstanding judges to sit on the trial court. One of the great judges of the supreme court of my State, Justice James T. Brand, went to Nuremburg and sat on some of the courts for some of the trials of German war criminals. A great justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Robert H. Jackson, served as chief prosecutor in behalf of the United States.

The record of those trials, over the weeks and the months, is a voluminous record, with every procedural guaranty, such as those I have just outlined and now to be found in the Geneva convention, preserved to the defendants.

As a lawyer, and one particularly interested in international law, I have read extensively on the Nuremburg trials. The interesting thing is that in many of the scholarly articles which have been written about the Nuremburg trials runs a constant repetition of the theme that the prosecuting countries leaned over backward in making certain that every possible procedural guaranty for a fair trial was available to the defendants. The articles which criticized the Nuremburg trials are, for the most part, articles which criticized the Allies because the trials were held at all, not because the trials were not fair.

As we all know, there is no question as to the international law basis for the indictments. Then, too, as I said in a dispatch some days ago, I would have my Cuban friends—for that matter, the people throughout the world, generally—reflect on the attitude of the great President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, at the close of the War Between the States. Mr. President, the Nation then was dealing with a revolt. It was dealing with a civil war. It was known as the War of the Rebellion. In that sense, so far as the definition of the type of conflict is concerned, there were many of the same definitive qualities in the tragic American Civil War as are found in the Cuban civil war. What was the attitude of the great President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, toward the leaders of the rebellion. Charity for all; a plea that the Nation unite; that we bind up the wounds of that revolt. The fact is that following the cessation of that war, there was no blood bath in our country against the vanquished.

I understand the great differences between the conduct of Batista and his followers and the conduct of southern leaders in the Civil War. I understand the great cruelties and the horrors which were inflicted upon many Cubans by the Batista regime. I do not say that the present Cuban Government should not proceed with prosecutions. But I have raised my voice in protest against hasty executions as a Christian, as one who believes that moral principles are the very basis of fair-trial procedure. I have objected to executions without the application of such fair procedures as those to which civilized nations committed themselves in the Geneva Conventions, in respect to war prisoners.

So I close these comments by renewing again my plea, as a friend of Cuba, for an early announcement to the world that fair procedures, applied in public trials, will prevail. That is all Cuba needs. Cuba does not need political drama. Cuba does not need to have fly into Havana American politicians having no official standing and no authority to do anything about what may happen anyway. What Cuba needs is to rededicate itself, as I said in my cablegram yesterday, to the spiritual significance of the mass, which, after all, is based upon the recognition that we all are creatures of the Creator, and that in man's relation to man the principles of morality should characterize our dealings with one another.

To buttress my reference to the Geneva Conventions, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks material taken from pages A18 and A19 and also beginning on page 117 and ending on page 126 of the Geneva Conventions.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RELATIONS BETWEEN PRISONERS OF WAR AND THE AUTHORITIES (SEC. VI)

With respect to penal and disciplinary sanctions, several new principles have been introduced. In article 83 an appeal is made to the indulgence of the authorities of the detaining power when deciding the question of whether an offense should be the subject of judicial or disciplinary action. In the 1929 text this principle referred only to offenses connected with escape. Article 84 provides that in general prisoners should be judged by military courts and in all cases by courts offering essential guaranties of independence and impartiality. In article 85 it is provided that prisoners of war prosecuted under the laws of the detaining power for acts committed prior to capture shall retain, even if convicted, the benefits of the convention. Article 87 provides that the courts and authorities of the detaining power shall take into consideration when fixing the penalty the fact that the accused prisoner is not a national of the detaining power and is not bound to it by any tie of allegiance, and permits the courts or authorities to lighten the sentence of the accused prisoner.

In article 89 there has been introduced a limitative enumeration of the various forms of disciplinary punishments applicable to prisoners. In this connection, there has been omitted the 1929 provision for punishment by disciplinary measures affecting rations. A basic safeguard has been included to the effect that the punishments shall never be inhuman, brutal, or dangerous to the health of prisoners of war.

Article 91 is new; it defines the conditions to be fulfilled in order that escapees may be regarded as successful.

In article 96 it should be noted that camp commandants are now prohibited from delegating their disciplinary powers to prisoners of war and are also required to keep a register of any disciplinary punishments inflicted which register shall be accessible to representatives of the protecting power. The importance of these provisions has been demonstrated by experience.

With respect to the articles relative to judicial proceedings, there has been introduced in article 99 the principle that no prisoner of war may be tried or sentenced for an act which is not forbidden by the law of the detaining power or by international law in force at the time the said act was committed. It has also been set forth that no prisoner of war may be tried without having the assistance of qualified counsel. Article 102 guarantees to prisoners of war the same trial procedure as provided for members of the armed forces of the detaining power. The provisions of the convention relating to such matters must also be observed. Article 105 provides that the detaining power shall find the accused a lawyer if he or the protecting power have not selected one and that the counsel shall be given the facilities necessary to prepare the defense. Also, it is provided that the particulars of the charge or charges on which the prisoner of war is to be arraigned and other court documents involved shall be communicated to the accused.

The system of notification of judgments to the protecting power has been improved. In the future, in accordance with article 107, the detailed notification which in the 1929 convention was required for the death penalty only is now to be made for all sentences.

Article 108 is new and defines the minimum conditions for the treatment of prisoners after sentence has been passed, particularly with regard to hygiene, correspondence, medical or spiritual aid, the application of penalties, and the provision of separate accommodations for women.

CHAPTER III. PENAL AND DISCIPLINARY SANCTIONS

1. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 82

A prisoner of war shall be subject to the laws, regulations and orders in force in the armed forces of the detaining power; the detaining power shall be justified in taking judicial or disciplinary measures in respect of any offense committed by a prisoner of war against such laws, regulations or orders. However, no proceedings or punishments contrary to the provisions of this chapter shall be allowed.

If any law, regulation or order of the detaining power shall declare acts committed by a prisoner of war to be punishable, whereas the same acts would not be punishable if committed by a member of the forces of the detaining power, such acts shall entail disciplinary punishments only.

In deciding whether proceedings in respect of an offense alleged to have been committed by a prisoner of war shall be judicial or disciplinary, the detaining power shall insure that the component authorities exercise the greatest leniency and adopt, wherever possible, disciplinary rather than judicial measures.

Article 84

A prisoner of war shall be tried only by a military court, unless the existing laws of the detaining power expressly permit the civil courts to try a member of the armed forces of the detaining power in respect of the particular offense alleged to have been committed by the prisoner of war.

In no circumstances whatever shall a prisoner of war be tried by a court of any kind which does not offer the essential guaranties of independence and impartiality as generally recognized, and, in particular, the procedure of which does not afford the accused the rights and means of defense provided for in article 105.

Article 85

Prisoners of war prosecuted under the laws of the detaining power for acts committed prior to capture shall retain, even if convicted, the benefits of the present convention.

Article 86

No prisoner of war may be punished more than once for the same act or on the same charge.

Article 87

Prisoners of war may not be sentenced by the military authorities and courts of the detaining power to any penalties except those provided for in respect of members of the armed forces of the said power who have committed the same acts.

When fixing the penalty, the courts or authorities of the detaining power shall take into consideration, to the widest extent possible, the fact that the accused, not being a national of the detaining power, is not bound to it by any duty of allegiance, and that he is in its power as the result of circumstances independent of his own will. The said courts or authorities shall be at liberty to reduce the penalty provided for the violation of which the prisoner of war is accused, and shall therefore not be bound to apply the minimum penalty prescribed.

Collective punishment for individual acts, corporal punishment, imprisonment in premises without daylight and, in general, any form of torture or cruelty, are forbidden.

No prisoner of war may be deprived of his rank by the detaining power, or prevented from wearing his badges.

Article 88

Officers, noncommissioned officers, and men who are prisoners of war undergoing a disciplinary or judicial punishment, shall not be subjected to more severe treatment than that applied in respect of the same punishment to members of the armed forces of the detaining power of equivalent rank.

A woman prisoner of war shall not be awarded or sentenced to a punishment more severe, or treated whilst undergoing punishment more severely, than a woman member of the armed forces of the detaining power dealt with for a similar offense.

In no case may a woman prisoner of war be awarded or sentenced to a punishment more severe, or treated whilst undergoing punishment more severely, than a male member of the armed forces of the detaining power dealt with for a similar offense.

Prisoners of war who have served disciplinary or judicial sentences may not be treated differently from other prisoners of war.

II. DISCIPLINARY SANCTIONS

Article 89

The disciplinary punishments applicable to prisoners of war are the following:

1. A fine which shall not exceed 50 percent of the advances of pay and working pay which the prisoner of war would otherwise receive under the provisions of articles 60 and 62 during a period of not more than 30 days.

2. Discontinuance of privileges granted over and above the treatment provided for by the present Convention.

3. Fatigue duties not exceeding 2 hours daily.

4. Confinement.

The punishment referred to under 3 shall not be applied to officers.

In no case shall disciplinary punishments be inhuman, brutal, or dangerous to the health of prisoners of war.

Article 90

The duration of any single punishment shall in no case exceed 30 days. Any period of confinement awaiting the hearing of a disciplinary offense or the award of disciplinary punishment shall be deducted from an award pronounced against a prisoner of war.

The maximum of 30 days provided above may not be exceeded, even if the prisoner of war is answerable for several acts at the same time when he is awarded punishment, whether such acts are related or not.

The period between the pronouncing of an award of disciplinary punishment and its execution shall not exceed 1 month.

When a prisoner of war is awarded a further disciplinary punishment, a period of at least 3 days shall elapse between the execution of any two of the punishments, if the duration of one of these is 10 days or more.

Article 91

The escape of a prisoner of war shall be deemed to have succeeded when:

1. He has joined the armed forces of the power on which he depends, or those of an allied power.

2. He has left the territory under the control of the detaining power, or of an ally of the said power.

3. He has joined a ship flying the flag of the power on which he depends, or of an allied power, in the territorial waters of the detaining power, the said ship not being under the control of the last named power.

Prisoners of war who have made good their escape in the sense of this article and who are recaptured, shall not be liable to any punishment in respect of their previous escape.

Article 92

A prisoner of war who attempts to escape and is recaptured before having made good his escape in the sense of article 91 shall be liable only to a disciplinary punishment in respect to this act, even if it is a repeated offense.

A prisoner of war who is recaptured shall be handed over without delay to the competent military authority.

Article 88, fourth paragraph, notwithstanding, prisoners of war punished as a result of an unsuccessful escape may be subjected to special surveillance. Such surveillance must not affect the state of their health, must be undergone in a prisoner of war camp, and must not entail the suppression of any of the safeguards granted them by the present convention.

Escape or attempt to escape, even if it is a repeated offense, shall not be deemed an aggravating circumstance if the prisoner of war is subjected to trial by judicial proceedings in respect of an offense committed during his escape or attempt to escape.

In conformity with the principle stated in article 83, offenses committed by prisoners of war with the sole intention of facilitating their escape and which do not entail any violence against life or limb, such as offenses against public property, theft without intention of self-enrichment, the drawing up or use of false papers, or the wearing of civilian clothing, shall occasion disciplinary punishment only.

Prisoners of war who aid or abet an escape or an attempt to escape shall be liable on this count to disciplinary punishment only.

Article 94

If an escaped prisoner of war is recaptured, the power on which he depends shall be notified thereof in the manner defined in article 122, provided notification of his escape has been made.

Article 95

A prisoner of war accused of an offense against discipline shall not be kept in confinement pending the hearing unless a member of the armed forces of the detaining power would be so kept if he were accused of a similar offense, or if it is essential in the interests of camp order and discipline.

Any period spent by a prisoner of war in confinement awaiting the disposal of an offense against discipline shall be reduced to an absolute minimum and shall not exceed 14 days.

The provisions of articles 97 and 98 of this chapter shall apply to prisoners of war who are in confinement awaiting the disposal of offenses against discipline.

Article 96

Acts which constitute offenses against discipline shall be investigated immediately.

Without prejudice to the competence of courts and superior military authorities, disciplinary punishment may be ordered only by an officer having disciplinary powers in his capacity as camp commander, or by a responsible officer who replaces him or to whom he has delegated his disciplinary powers.

In no case may such powers be delegated to a prisoner of war or be exercised by a prisoner of war.

Before any disciplinary award is pronounced, the accused shall be given precise information regarding the offenses of which he is accused, and given an opportunity of explaining his conduct and of defending himself. He shall be permitted, in particular, to call witnesses and to have recourse, if necessary, to the services of a qualified interpreter. The decision shall be announced to the accused prisoner of war and to the prisoners' representative.

A record of disciplinary punishments shall be maintained by the camp commander and shall be open to inspection by representatives of the protecting power.

Article 97

Prisoners of war shall not in any case be transferred to penitentiary establishments (prisons, penitentiaries, convict prisons, etc.) to undergo disciplinary punishment therein.

All premises in which disciplinary punishments are undergone shall conform to the sanitary requirements set forth in article 25. A prisoner of war undergoing punishment shall be enabled to keep himself in a state of cleanliness, in conformity with article 29.

Officers and persons of equivalent status shall not be lodged in the same quarters as noncommissioned officers or men.

Women prisoners of war undergoing disciplinary punishment shall be confined in separate quarters from male prisoners of war and shall be under the immediate supervision of women.

Article 98

A prisoner of war undergoing confinement as a disciplinary punishment shall continue to enjoy the benefits of the provisions of this convention except insofar as these are necessarily rendered inapplicable by the mere fact that he is confined. In no case may he be deprived of the benefits of the provisions of articles 78 and 126.

A prisoner of war awarded disciplinary punishment may not be deprived of the prerogatives attached to his rank.

Prisoners of war awarded disciplinary punishment shall be allowed to exercise and to stay in the open air at least 2 hours daily.

They shall be allowed, on their request, to be present at the daily medical inspections. They shall receive the attention which their state of health requires and, if necessary, shall be removed to the camp infirmary or to a hospital.

They shall have permission to read and write, likewise to send and receive letters. Parcels and remittances of money, however, may be withheld from them until the completion of the punishment; they shall meanwhile be entrusted to the prisoners' representative, who will hand over to the infirmary the perishable goods contained in such parcels.

III. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

Article 99

No prisoner of war may be tried or sentenced for an act which is not forbidden by the law of the detaining power or by international law, in force at the time the said act was committed.

No moral or physical coercion may be exerted on a prisoner of war in order to induce him to admit himself guilty of the act of which he is accused.

No prisoner of war may be convicted without having had an opportunity to present his defense and the assistance of a qualified advocate or counsel.

Article 100

Prisoners of war and the protecting powers shall be informed as soon as possible of the offenses which are punishable by the death sentence under the laws of the detaining power.

Other offenses shall not thereafter be made punishable by the death penalty without the concurrence of the power on which the prisoners of war depend.

The death sentence cannot be pronounced on a prisoner of war unless the attention of the court has, in accordance with article 87, second paragraph, been particularly called to the fact that since the accused is not a national of the detaining power, he is not bound to it by any duty of allegiance, and that he is in its power as the result of circumstances independent of his own will.

Article 101

If the death penalty is pronounced on a prisoner of war, the sentence shall not be executed before the expiration of a period of at least 6 months from the date when the protecting power receives, at an indicated address, the detailed communication provided for in article 107.

Article 102

A prisoner of war can be validly sentenced only if the sentence has been pronounced by the same courts according to the same procedure as in the case of members of the armed forces of the detaining power, and if, furthermore, the provisions of the present chapter have been observed.

Article 103

Judicial investigations relating to a prisoner of war shall be conducted as rapidly as circumstances permit and so that his trial shall take place as soon as possible. A prisoner of war shall not be confined while awaiting trial unless a member of the armed forces of the detaining power would be so confined if he were accused of a similar offense, or if it is essential to do so in the interests of national security. In no circumstances shall this confinement exceed 3 months.

Any period spent by a prisoner of war in confinement awaiting trial shall be deducted from any sentence of imprisonment passed upon him and taken into account in fixing any penalty.

The provisions of articles 97 and 98 of this chapter shall apply to a prisoner of war whilst in confinement awaiting trial.

Article 104

In any case in which the detaining power has decided to institute judicial proceedings against a prisoner of war, it shall notify the protecting power as soon as possible and at least 3 weeks before the opening of the trial. This period of 3 weeks shall run as from the day on which such notification reaches the protecting power at the address previously indicated by the latter to the detaining power.

The said notification shall contain the following information:

1. Surname and first names of the prisoner of war, his rank, his army, regimental, personal or serial number, his date of birth, and his profession or trade, if any.

2. Place of internment or confinement.

3. Specification of the charge or charges on which the prisoner of war is to be arraigned, giving the legal provisions applicable.

4. Designation of the court which will try the case, likewise the date and place fixed for the opening of the trial.

The same communication shall be made by the detaining power to the prisoners' representative.

If no evidence is submitted, at the opening of the trial, that the notification referred to above was received by the protecting power, by the prisoner of war and by the prisoner's representative concerned, at least 3 weeks before the opening of the trial, then the latter cannot take place and must be adjourned.

Article 105

The prisoner of war shall be entitled to assistance by one of his prisoner comrades, to defense by a qualified advocate or counsel of his own choice, to the calling of witnesses and, if he deems necessary, to the services of a competent interpreter. He shall be advised of these rights by the detaining power in due time before the trial.

Failing a choice by the prisoner of war, the protecting power shall find him an advocate or counsel, and shall have at least 1 week at its disposal for the purpose. The detaining power shall deliver to the said power, on request, a list of persons qualified to present the defense. Failing a choice of an advocate or counsel by the prisoner of war or the protecting power, the detaining power shall appoint a competent advocate or counsel to conduct the defense.

The advocate or counsel conducting the defense on behalf of the prisoner of war shall have at his disposal a period of 2 weeks at least before the opening of the trial, as well as the necessary facilities to prepare the defense of the accused. He may, in particular, freely visit the accused and interview him in private. He may also confer with any witnesses for the defense, including prisoners of war. He shall have the benefit of these facilities until the term of appeal or petition has expired.

Particulars of the charge or charges on which the prisoner of war is to be arraigned, as well as the documents which are generally communicated to the accused by virtue of the laws in force in the armed forces of the detaining power, shall be communicated to the accused prisoner of war in a language which he understands, and in good time before the opening of the trial. The same communication in the same circumstances shall be made to the advocate or counsel conducting the defense on behalf of the prisoner of war.

The representatives of the protecting power shall be entitled to attend the trial of the case, unless, exceptionally, this is held in camera in the interest of state security. In such a case the detaining power shall advise the protecting power accordingly.

Article 106

Every prisoner of war shall have, in the same manner as the members of the armed forces of the detaining power, the right of appeal or petition from any sentence pronounced upon him, with a view to the quashing or revising of the sentence or the reopening of the trial. He shall be fully informed of his right to appeal or petition and of the time limit within which he may do so.

Any judgment and sentence pronounced upon a prisoner of war shall be immediately reported to the protecting power in the form of a summary communication, which shall also indicate whether he has the right of appeal with a view to the quashing of the sentence or the reopening of the trial. This communication shall likewise be sent to the prisoners' representative concerned. It shall also be sent to the accused prisoner of war in a language he understands, if the sentence was not pronounced in his presence. The detaining power shall also immediately communicate to the protecting power the decision of the prisoner of war to use or to waive his right of appeal.

Furthermore, if a prisoner of war is finally convicted or if a sentence pronounced on a prisoner of war in the first instance is a death sentence, the detaining power shall as soon as possible address to the protecting power a detailed communication containing:

1. The precise wording of the finding and sentence.

2. A summarized report of any preliminary investigation and of the trial, emphasizing in particular the elements of the prosecution and the defense.

3. Notification, where applicable, of the establishment where the sentence will be served.

The communications provided for in the foregoing subparagraphs shall be sent to the protecting power at the address previously made known to the detaining power.

Article 108

Sentences pronounced on prisoners of war after a conviction has become duly enforceable, shall be served in the same establishments and under the same conditions as in the case of members of the armed forces of the detaining power. These conditions shall in all cases conform to the requirements of health and humanity.

A woman prisoner of war on whom such a sentence has been pronounced shall be confined in separate quarters and shall be under the supervision of women.

In any case, prisoners of war sentenced to a penalty depriving them of their liberty shall retain the benefit of the provisions of articles 78 and 126 of the present convention. Furthermore, they shall be entitled to receive and dispatch correspondence, to receive at least one relief parcel monthly, to take regular exercise in the open air, to have the medical care required by their state of health, and the spiritual assistance they may desire. Penalties to which they may be subjected shall be in accordance with the provisions of article 87, third paragraph.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, these are but documentations of the statements I have made as to what is contained in the Geneva Conventions.

I now ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks certain quotations from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, dated June 27, 1955, when the committee unanimously reported these conventions to the Senate. The material is found on pages 15 through 17, under the heading "Penal and Disciplinary Sanctions." It contains a discussion of the procedures which should prevail.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

5. Penal and disciplinary sanctions: One of the most important chapters in the convention is that relating to penal and disciplinary sanctions (arts. 82–108). This chapter sets forth the circumstances under which prisoners may be tried for various infractions of the laws and regulations of the detaining power; establishes maximum punishments for disciplinary offenses including attempted escapes; provides specific safeguards and guaranties of a fair judicial proceeding; and prohibit procedures and punishments contrary to those set out in the convention.

Article 82 provides that acts punishable by the laws of the detaining power, but which are not punishable if committed by a member of that power's forces, shall entail only disciplinary punishment. This provision should be read together with article 87, which excludes the application to prisoners of any penalties other than those provided for such acts in respect of members of the armed force of the detaining power. Women prisoners may not be more severely treated or punished than women members of the detaining power's own forces for like offenses (art. 88). No prisoner may be tried or sentenced for an act which is not forbidden by the law of the detaining power or by international law in force at the time the said act was committed (art. 99)—a provision of particular significance in view of criticism voiced against the alleged ex post facto nature of certain aspects of the Nuremberg war crimes proceeding. Under article 84, the prisoner has the right to be tried by a military court unless the existing laws of the detaining power expressly permit the civil courts to try members of that power's own forces in respect of the offense alleged. In no event may he be tried by any court not offering the essential guaranties of independence and impartiality generally recognized, nor under procedure which fails to accord the rights of defense set forth in article 105. The latter article gives him the right to freely chosen counsel, to call witnesses, and to the services of a competent interpreter. Should he or the protecting power fail to select counsel, the detaining power must find one for him. Other provisions insure that his counsel will have opportunity to prepare an adequate defense along with the right of appeal (arts. 106–107).

One of the most extensively debated subjects at the Conference was whether a prisoner who is prosecuted for a precapture crime, in particular, offenses against the laws of war, should enjoy the benefits of the convention. On this, article 85 provides:

"Prisoners of war prosecuted under the laws of the detaining power for acts committed prior to capture shall retain, even if convicted, the benefits of the present convention."

The article was adopted over the opposition of the Soviet bloc, which attached a reservation thereto at the time of signature. That reservation, and the committee's recommendations with respect to it, are discussed in a separate section. (See sec. 13 below.)

Article 86 repeats the injunction of article 52 in the 1929 convention against punishing prisoners more than once for the same offense (non bis in idem). Article 102 requires that trials be by the same court as in the case of members of the armed forces of the detaining power. Collective punishment for individual acts, corporal punishment, imprisonment in premises without daylight, and any form of torture or cruelty are prohibited.

In contrast with the rather general language of the 1929 convention on disciplinary punishment, the 1949 convention contains a limitative enumeration of those types of disciplinary penalties which may be applied to prisoners. In no case may such punishments be inhuman, brutal, or dangerous to the prisoners' health. Whereas article 55 of the former document permitted food restrictions as an increase in punishment, the present instrument omits any authorization of this kind.

6. Escape, release, and repatriation: Articles 91–95 detail with greater thoroughness than heretofore the consequences of attempted escapes and define the conditions which must be met before an escape can be regarded as successful (art. 91), an important addition because of the effects produced by a successful escape. Another new provision prohibits camp commanders from delegating their disciplinary powers to prisoners of war, and requires a record to be kept of disciplinary punishments open to inspection by representatives of the protecting power (art. 96).

Articles 109–116 deal with direct repatriation and accommodation of prisoners in neutral countries. Articles 109–110 set forth principles under which parties to the conflict are obligated to repatriate seriously wounded and sick prisoners of war. Specified categories may also be accommodated in neutral countries after agreement with the latter. No wounded and sick prisoner eligible for repatriation may be repatriated against his will during hostilities.

Articles 118–121 contain provisions on the release and repatriation of prisoners of war at the close of hostilities, deceased prisoners, death certificates, burial and cremation, and the transmittal of wills to the protecting power. Article 118 requires that "prisoners of war shall be released and repatriated without delay after the cessation of active hostilities," a principle which occasioned the dispute during the Korean armistice negotiations as to whether a belligerent was obligated to repatriate prisoners against their will. (See sec. 10 below.) Finally, under article 121, whenever death or serious injury of a prisoner of war is caused by a sentry or any other person or is due to unknown causes, an official inquiry must be held by the detaining power, and measures taken to prosecute the guilty.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I renew my assurance to the new President of Cuba and to General Castro that we are the friends of Cuba. We have raised a critical voice, in these first few days following the overthrow of the Batista regime, in protest against what, in fact, was a blood bath. When men are taken out before an open grave within a few minutes after charges have been hurled at them verbally by a small group of military officers, without any time to prepare a defense, without an opportunity to call witnesses, and without a period for the relaxation of tensions, so that reason can prevail, those responsible for such action are engaging in a blood bath. They are not following the high moral standards which the civilized nations of the world adopted in the Geneva Convention.

Let me repeat that it is not too late; and, again, my prayer will be that we shall read the glorious announcement from Cuba that the leadership of that Government has postponed further executions until such fair trial procedures as the ones I have outlined today can work their course in public trials of those charged with the commission of crimes against the Government.

So, Mr. President, I would have the President of Cuba and General Castro recognize that in a democracy there is no substitute for full public disclosure of the people's business. Crimes against the state are the people's business.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to compliment and commend the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], not only for his remarks today on the most sensitive and vital subject of the developments in Cuba and on our relationships with the Cuban Republic, but also for the quality of statesmanship and vision that he has demonstrated ever since the success of the Cuban revolution and, in fact, even in the months prior to that success. The Senator from Oregon has been principled in his comment and stand and, at the same time, considerate and tolerant.

I hope the people of Cuba realize that the remarks which have been made by Members of the Senate, and, in particular, by the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs [Mr. MORSE], were made, not in a spirit of hostility, bitterness, or antagonism, but, rather, in a spirit of understanding, friendship, advice, and kindly admonition. They were made in a sincere effort to maintain wholesome, respectful, and cordial relationships between the people of Cuba and the people of the United States.

So I desire to thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Of course I want the Senator from Minnesota to know that I appreciate his kind personal references.

But the much more significant feature of the statement he has made just now is that he had added his voice in restrained comment on this great moral issue.

I wish to say that, in my judgment, what the Senator from Minnesota has just now stated probably will exercise more influence for good than will what has been said by all the rest of us. I happen to know the very high regard in which the Senator from Minnesota is held in Cuba and in other Latin-American countries because of the great work he has done during his service on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and because of the leadership he has extended time and time again in our efforts to do more to help improve conditions in the republics to the south of us.

On behalf of my committee, I thank the Senator from Minnesota very much for the great support he has just now given us by the remarks he has made on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARTKE in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

TEST BAN NEGOTIATIONS AND EFFECT OF NEW SCIENTIFIC DATA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today I wish to comment on the nuclear test ban negotiations taking place in Geneva and on the effect of the new scientific data recently announced by the White House regarding detection of underground nuclear explosions.

I am sure that everyone in this Chamber is aware that at the present time negotiations between the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union are going on in Geneva, Switzerland, for the purpose of drafting a treaty on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests, under effective inspection and safeguards. I was privileged to serve as a congressional adviser at these negotiations, as were also my distinguished colleagues, the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] and the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER]. Two Members of the House of Representatives, Mr. ASPINALL and Mr. VAN ZANDT, also attended the negotiations last fall.

Members of the Senate are also familiar with the fact that the negotiations in Geneva for a ban on nuclear tests stem in part from the fact that scientists from the United States and other western nations reached agreement with scientists from the Soviet bloc, at a technical conference held last summer, on the ways to detect violations of a possible agreement on the suspension of nuclear tests. It is on the basis of this technical report that our negotiators are now attempting to draft a treaty incorporating the conclusions of the conference of experts.

The Geneva negotiations have been making slow but, nevertheless, steady progress. Although it is still unclear as to whether the negotiations will succeed, and I must caution my colleagues that most of the difficult issues must still be discussed, agreement has been reached on four articles of a proposed treaty.

Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate the announcement made by our delegation at Geneva yesterday, Monday, January 19. The New York Times of today, Tuesday, January 20, has published an article under the headline "West Drops Demand To Tie Atom Ban to Disarmament."

Under a Geneva dateline of January 19, the article commences with the following:

> The United States and Britain made a major concession to the Soviet Union today in an attempt to end the stalemate in the three-power conference for ending nuclear weapon tests.
> The West abandoned its demand that the duration of the proposed treaty for a controlled ban on such tests be linked to progress in other fields of disarmament. The shift in position was announced at today's 37th meeting of the conference by James J. Wadsworth, chief U.S. delegate, and David Ormsby-Gore, leader of the British delegation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the article be printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST DROPS DEMAND TO TIE ATOM BAN TO DISARMAMENT

GENEVA, January 19.—The United States and Britain made a major concession to the Soviet Union today in an attempt to end the stalemate in the three-power conference for ending nuclear weapon tests.

The West abandoned its demand that the duration of the proposed treaty for a controlled ban on such tests be linked to progress in other fields of disarmament. The shift in position was announced at today's 37th meeting of the conference by James J. Wadsworth, chief United States delegate, and David Ormsby-Gore, leader of the British delegation.

Mr. Wadsworth informed Semyon K. Tsarapkin, chief Soviet delegate, that the United States no longer maintained one of the two key conditions President Eisenhower once said would have to be met for the United States to continue the nuclear weapons test ban on a year-by-year basis.

EISENHOWER REMARK RECALLED

The President said August 22 that one condition for continuing the ban on testing nuclear weapons was that "satisfactory progress is being made in reaching agreement on and implementing major and substantial arms-control measures."

But the United States delegate went on to make it clear in his statement that the concession was being made to allow the conference to get down to negotiating the other key condition set by the President. This was "that an agreed inspection system is installed and working effectively."

Mr. Ormsby-Gore followed with a similar statement.

The carefully prepared Western move was designed to force the Soviet Union into a put up or shut up position. In the Western view, the Soviet Union must either discuss the details of an effective system for policing a ban or admit it does not want real international controls.

The Soviet Union has virtually stalemated the conference since it was resumed January 5 after the Christmas holidays by giving precedence to the duration issue over all others. It has insisted that to link the duration of the ban to disarmament progress would leave the treaty open to denunciation virtually at will. No clearly objective basis for gaging disarmament progress possible, the Soviet delegation has contended.

U.S. AIDS EXPLAIN MOVE

U.S. delegation sources said that the concession to this Soviet view was a "sincere effort" to break up the conference logjam. They also described it as a "major move" to get the conference onto the key issue of controls, because without a foolproof detection and inspection system there would be no treaty.

"What the Soviet Union has repeatedly maintained is the main obstacle to a treaty has now been removed by the United Kingdom and the United States," Mr. Ormsby-Gore said in a statement to the press. "We have demonstrated our sincere determination to reach an agreement."

The Western move has been under intense preparation since last Wednesday. At the request of the Western delegations, conference meetings scheduled for Thursday and Friday were canceled to give them time for consultations.

Immediately after the West made its announcement at today's meeting, Mr. Tsarapkin said he was pleased to see that the West had discarded the link between the treaty's duration and disarmament. He added, however, that he was still desirous of seeing the Western Powers introduce their proposed article on the lifetime of the treaty, which the West again promised would be forthcoming in the near future.

But the Soviet delegate nonetheless said he was now prepared to go on to discuss the four draft articles on the working of the control organization that the United States submitted. They deal with a control commission, a conference of parties to the treaty, an international administrator and the staff and detection system itself.

Mr. Tsarapkin said discussion should continue at the same time on a Soviet draft article on the obligation of nations signing the treaty to accept control posts and other elements of a system on their territory.

U.S. sources emphasized that while the West would drop the issue of linking disarmament questions to the duration of the nuclear weapons ban treaty a desire to see progress made on them would be mentioned in the preamble to the pact. The preamble will express the conviction that in setting up a controlled ban on nuclear weapons tests the way will be opened for similar agreements on arms-reducing measures.

Western sources reiterate that in the Western view doing away with nuclear weapon tests is in itself not real disarmament.

Mr. Tsarapkin was presiding today when the West made its attempt to end the stalemate in the conference, which started October 31.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am very pleased and heartened by the action taken by the Western delegations at Geneva in dropping the so-called disarmament tie-in, or link, to the nuclear test discontinuance treaty. In the month of November, when it was my privilege to be present at these negotiations, I had felt that this was a desirable move. At that time I recommended, to both the U.S. delegation and to the United Kingdom delegation, that the proposal for a clause relating to disarmament progress be dropped from the discussions in Geneva. I believe this gives us a better working position. Surely it removes one of the alleged obstacles to the success of the conference. My position on this matter was known by the State Department, since I conveyed my personal point of view directly to the responsible officers of our Government upon my return from the visit to Geneva.

EXAGGERATED CLAIMS

In the midst of these negotiations the White House issued a statement, on January 5, 1959, to the effect that new scientific data have appeared which indicate "it is more difficult to identify underground explosions than had previously been believed." The White House announcement, which was made by the President's Science Advisory Committee, has resulted in some exaggerated statements and claims. On the one hand, some people charge that the new information is not genuine and that it has been put forth by those who do not want to see a ban on tests. One correspondent, for example, says:

> There is something fishy about the timing and the content of the White House announcement. Is this another underground triumph for Dr. Teller? * * * Are they [the scientists] jumping to conclusions they have long sought in order to block a test cessation they have always opposed?

On the other hand, there are claims that the new data make an agreement to ban tests under effective control impossible, and we should immediately call off the negotiations. To cite a case in point, a prominent magazine writes that the announcement means that "the real minimum underground blast that could be fully detected was about 20 kilotons—about the size of the Nagasaki-Hiroshima bombs. Should the United States trust to any stop-test agreement where the chances of deception are so great as to be a major risk to survival?"

I mention these two quotations simply to point out what I believe to be the exaggerated claims and exaggerated interpretations of the new scientific data. It is my view that the data should be taken under very careful study, which I intend to do this afternoon, and then we should come up with much more sober and restrained judgments.

The information which was made available on January 5 by the White House was information that some of us knew about at least a month prior to that announcement date. Since the negotiations were under way, we withheld any discussion of the scientific information, leaving revelation of the new scientific data to the responsible executive officers.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON DISARMAMENT TO HOLD HEARINGS

Neither of the two quotations I referred to reflects an accurate picture of what has happened. All of us who have some responsibility in matters of arms control and in matters of our national defense must understand the significance of these new developments. And the information must be shared with the American people. The Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Disarmament, of which I am privileged to be chairman, will hold hearings on the subject in a few days, and the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has already held sessions to review the problem.

DATA ARE NOT FALSE

The White House announcement is not the result of data trumped up by Dr. Teller or anyone else. It is true that the very famous and able Dr. Teller does not favor a ban on nuclear weapons tests, but insofar as I am aware, Dr. Teller had nothing to do with the gathering of the new material.

To be sure, he may be using it to try to persuade people that the test ban negotiations should be called off, but I want the record to make clear that he did not create the data. His opposition to cessation of nuclear tests is longstanding. He has very sincere convictions about his position, and those convictions are surely worthy of respect.

How, then, did the data originate?

When the President, on August 22, 1958, indicated that the United States would stop testing October 31, 1958, pending the outcome of the political negotiations of a test ban treaty, the Atomic Energy Commission quickly planned several tests at the Nevada proving grounds during September and October. Four of these were underground tests.

As chairman of the Disarmament Subcommittee, I had encouraged the Atomic Energy Commission to do more research in the field of underground tests in an effort to perfect our detection system.

Prior to the October tests I have referred to, there had been one underground test, in September 1957, the so-called Ranier test. It goes without saying one underground test is inadequate for the purposes of sound and conclusive scientific data.

Of the four recent underground tests to which I referred, two were below 1 kiloton, one was approximately 4.5 kilotons, and one was about 23 kilotons.

During the month of November seismologists reported to the U.S. Government as to whether and how their seismographs picked up the four tests. This material was received by two groups. One was the U.S. Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the other was the group responsible for detecting nuclear tests.

The records of the seismologists were analyzed further by a special panel of scientists from various Government agencies and from private institutions during the test ban conference recess, from December 16 to January 5. Although the study of what should and could be done to improve the control system had not been completed, the Science Advisory Committee decided to issue a general statement to the public. At the same time the United States made the data and an analysis of it available to the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom, the two other nations participating in the test ban negotiations. On January 16 the Defense Department released more detailed information to the press.

I cite these events to show that the data presented are genuine, and not something that has been invented by those who wish to scuttle the test ban negotiations. However, this does not mean the data proves detection of nuclear tests has now become so difficult that, to quote again from a prominent periodical, "the chances of deception are so great as to be a major risk to survival" because "the real minimum underground blast that could be fully detected was about 20 kilotons." This conclusion not only is invalid, it is factually incorrect and completely misleading.

Rather than be critical of any periodical, the Senate Subcommittee on Disarmament, with its competent staff, would be more than willing to share information with those who are responsible for bringing to the public information relating to these highly technical matters.

I fear that the secrecy surrounding some of these scientific data leads to distortion in the reports which come to the public. This is another argument for more information to be made available to the public from the Government agencies. If such information were more readily available and were not under the cloak of secrecy, I believe those who write stories for our newspapers and periodicals would have a much better understanding of the subject. They would be able to do a much more accurate and comprehensive task of reporting.

WHAT THE DATA SHOWED

The analysis by the panel of scientists seemed to indicate that the control system as devised by the Geneva Conference of Experts, and which was based on scientific evidence available at the time, would have a more difficult job to distinguish between nuclear explosions and earthquakes than had previously been realized. The new data also showed that "seismic signals produced by explosions are smaller than had been anticipated and that there are consequently about twice as many natural earthquakes equivalent to an underground explosion of a given yield as had been estimated by the Geneva Conference of Experts."

That is a quotation from the announcement of January 5 by the President's Science Advisory Committee. For the record, the Geneva Conference of Experts referred to in that statement is the Conference of last July and August, attended by scientists of the United States of America, the U.S.S.R., and the United Kingdom.

It is important to stress that the new information does not bear so much on the detection of nuclear tests as it bears on the identification of earthquakes which must be made so that they can be distinguished from nuclear explosions and thus eliminated by the control organizations as suspicious events. Signals received at control posts which cannot clearly be identified as earthquakes must be subject to on-the-spot inspection, according to the Geneva technical agreement on detecting tests.

IMPROVEMENTS POSSIBLE

The significance of the new data and what can be done about it are subject to varying interpretations. Some view the information in such a pessimistic light that they advocate suspending only atmospheric tests but continuing underground tests. Others are more optimistic and believe that improvements can be made so that the risk to the United States of entering into a test ban agreement will not be significantly increased. In fact, the new data on underground explosions prompted further research and study on detection methods. Already new methods of detection have been found.

I believe, Mr. President, this is the first announcement of the new methods which have been found. The four underground tests of October 1958, and the new scientific data which came from those tests have acted as a catalyst to spur on greater research in the field of detection and inspection. In others words, what seemed to be a definite blow to the possibilities of effective inspection has spurred our scientists on to find new methods and new means of improving detection.

As has been said about weapons, no matter how terrible the weapon there always seems to be some type of defense. In this instance, with the new data we have discovered relating to the difficulty of identifying earthquakes, we have now been able, through a special study panel appointed by the President's Science Advisory Committee, to find new and improved methods of detection.

I understand that there are several promising techniques to improve the capabilities without increasing the size of the system recommended by the conference of experts at Geneva. These include: Building better instruments, which is not only possible but underway, devising ways to blot out background noise, placing seismographs deep in the earth, substantially increasing the number of seismographs at each control post over the number provided for in the Geneva report, utilization of additional methods to distinguish earthquake signals from nuclear explosions other than the determination of first motion, and use of unmanned seismographs to augment the Geneva system. Another obvious improvement is to increase the number of manned control posts. The President's Science Advisory Committee, under the chairmanship of Dr. Killian, is continuing to study how the control system might be improved. I hope and urge that its report be made public.

I state for the record that Dr. Killian's committee is to be commended for proceeding forthwith on these new studies relating to improved methods of inspection, detection, and control.

This is all very technical. I could discuss in some technical detail each of the suggestions to which I have referred, relating to an improved detection system. Suffice it to say that these suggestions will be analyzed in detail by the special panel of the Science Advisory Committee which is making the present study relating to detection.

BASIS OF THE GENEVA CONCLUSIONS

To view the new data in perspective it is worthwhile to recall the basis of the conclusions of the Geneva Conference of Experts regarding the detection of underground nuclear tests. The Geneva conclusions are based on the following premises: That if five or more seismographic stations at various directions from the source of an underground event are able, not only to detect the event, but determine the direction of the first motion on the seismogram—that is, whether the first motion is compressional—line on seismogram goes upward—or dilatational—downward first motion on seismogram—that then some 90 percent of the earthquakes can be eliminated as not being nuclear explosions or suspicious events. Whether the five stations can determine first motion depends somewhat on the distance of the seismograph from the source of the event—at certain distances the direction of first motion is difficult to determine—and on the amplitude, that is strength, of the signal.

Mr. President, I call to your attention that the Senate Subcommittee on Disarmament has published a rather comprehensive study on the use of seismographs relating to this detection system. As the Senate knows, we conducted a nationwide study, with the cooperation of eminent seismologists, on detection methods. I only refer briefly to that study now because I do not believe it is necessary for me to elucidate the points or the conclusions which were reached in it.

This is an important subject. If the Geneva Conference agrees on a treaty, that is, if the representatives of the executive branch of the Government should agree on a treaty, for the discontinuance of nuclear tests, it will be the responsibility of the U.S. Senate either to approve or reject it. As chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Disarmament, I feel it a special responsibility to state for the record from time to time some of the scientific information we have been able to obtain. Thereby we can keep the Senate informed, on a regularized, orderly basis, as to some of the more important technical developments which are taking place during the Geneva Conference.

I know that Members of the Senate will weigh such a proposed treaty very carefully I prefer that the treaty, if it does come to us, be judged not on the basis of half-truths, not on the basis of emotion, fears, or prejudice, but that it be judged in terms of the best scientific information we have available. Moreover, it is necessary to apply the political judgment which is always a significant factor in the conduct of international relations.

To return to the technical aspects of this subject, the determination of first motion also depends on whether the seismographic station is at a site which is relatively free of noise from other factors. If the size of the wiggle on the seismogram showing the direction of the first motion is quite small, and if there is substantial background noise at the seismographic station, then the direction of the first motion might be extremely difficult to determine correctly or accurately. Signals that cannot be definitely determined as coming from earthquakes, according to the Geneva conclusions, must be subject to on-the-spot inspection.

The scientists at Geneva also thought that if five seismographic stations recorded some compressional waves as first motions and some dilatational or rarefaction first motions, this was a definite sign of an earthquake and, therefore, probably need not be investigated. However, if all or most of the seismographic stations recorded the direction of the first motion as compressional, then this was to be regarded as suspicious evidence that a nuclear test has occurred. An investigation would then be permissible. According to the report of the panel of scientists who studied the results of the recent underground tests, the new data does not change this significant and important conclusion of the Conference of Experts at Geneva last summer.

The number of stations recommended by the Geneva Conference of Experts was based on identifying about 90 percent of the earthquakes equivalent to a nuclear explosion of 5 kilotons and thus eliminating them as suspicious events necessitating on-the-spot inspection. The capability of the control system devised at Geneva to identify underground events of less than 5 kilotons would depend on—and (c) the fraction of events still left unidentified which could be suspected of being nuclear explosions and for which the international control organ carries out inspection.

(a) the small fraction of earthquakes that can be identified on the basis of data obtained from the control posts alone; (b) the fraction of earthquakes that can be identified with the aid of supplementary data obtained from existing seismic stations—

The control organization would also have a capability to deter a potential violator so long as there existed the right of spot checking the source of signals on the seismographs which appeared suspicious. In other words, the right of inspection would exist even though it would not be practical to investigate the source of every signal that could not be identified as coming from an earthquake.

The real problem is how to differentiate earthquakes from underground explosions. In certain areas of the world there are vast numbers of earthquakes. Certain conclusions were drawn at the Geneva Conference of Experts as to the number of earthquakes in any one year. Our problem in negotiating a treaty is not in any way to jeopardize our national security and to be able to determine whether or not any country is violating the terms of the treaty. One of our main tasks, therefore, is to develop such a sensitive control and detection system, through the use of seismographs and other techniques, that we may be able to differentiate between an earthquake and a nuclear underground explosion.

That is the heart and core of the problem. Make no mistake about it. This is a very serious matter, and one which is filled with all sorts of difficulties. Our scientists are now busily engaged in trying to improve their detection systems and the machines and equipment used for such detection, because of the new data which came to us as a result of the four most recent underground explosions.

It seems rather regrettable to me that our Government waited so long to explore means of detection of underground explosions. I mention this today because my colleagues must recall that from March to September 1957, our negotiators were at London negotiating with the Soviet representatives on an overall package of disarmament proposals, one of which was stopping nuclear tests.

Up to that time, we had not had even a single underground test explosion. We knew nothing about underground detection as the result of any practical experience with nuclear underground explosions. I want the Senate record to note that while our Government was proposing to the Soviet Union a total disarmament program, one of the points of which was the prohibition of further nuclear tests, with inspection—and the news stories emphasized the word "inspection"—the Government of the United States had no inspection system based on scientific fact that could have policed such an agreement had the Soviet Union accepted it. It seems to me that that was a rather hazardous operation. I suggest that when we negotiate with the Soviets we should know exactly what we are doing. Apparently we expected them to say "No," and they accommodated us. We expected them to reject our proposals, and they did as we expected.

What if they had accepted our proposals? We would have found ourselves in a situation where the Soviet Union could have gone ahead with a series of underground nuclear explosions, because we did not have any system designed or organized, for the purpose of providing adequate detection.

NUMBER OF EARTHQUAKES STILL UNCERTAIN

In deciding the number of earthquakes that would need to be identified and, therefore, eliminated from inspection control the Conference of Experts was somewhat vague. The reason for this vagueness in part stems from a difference of view between the Western and Soviet scientists as to how many earthquakes of a given size occur each year. The difference of opinion over this matter appears to be not unusual. Seismologists and geologists have not heretofore been concerned with small earthquakes and have, therefore, not concentrated on devising seismographs or seismographic sites to record them. They have been primarily concerned with the larger earthquakes which could be a danger to cities and populations.

The number of earthquakes that occur each year of various sizes, therefore, is at present a mathematical calculation or an extrapolation downward of what has been known about the number of large earthquakes. The number of earthquakes is not yet determined as a result of close and persistent scientific observation. As I said before, it is at best an educated estimate. For this reason, a great deal more research must be done before scientists have reliable knowledge in this field.

The new data presented to the President's Science Advisory Committee indicate that since an underground test might give off a weaker signal than previously believed by Western and Soviet scientists, that therefore, the control system will have more earthquake signals to cope with and thus have more of a burden placed upon it than had previously been thought. And, to repeat, the fact that some nuclear explosions give off weaker signals makes the determination of the direction of the first motion more difficult. But again to repeat, many of the scientists who have studied these results feel that through improvements in scientific instruments and further research, the capabilities of the control system can be increased. In fact, the President's Science Advisory Committee has so indicated.

Mr. President, as has been determined by the new data, some nuclear explosions give off weak signals, and thereby make the determination of the direction of the first motion more difficult to ascertain. If the weaker signal can be confused with an earthquake signal, improvement in detection involves differentiating an earthquake signal, which is not dangerous, from a nuclear explosion signal, which could be dangerous. That is our problem. It is not an easy one.

NEW DATA MAY HAVE POSITIVE AS WELL AS NEGATIVE IMPLICATIONS

The new data does not indicate that nuclear tests will definitely be more difficult to detect. Actually, the data appear to indicate that in some respects it may be easier to detect nuclear tests than the Conference of Experts at Geneva had concluded. This is so because the Geneva Conference thought that the determination of the direction of the first motion was about the only way that earthquakes could be distinguished from nuclear explosions. The new data appeared to show that surface waves from a nuclear explosion are weaker than from earthquakes of comparable size and that, therefore, analysis of surface waves may be used to distinguish between the two.

In addition, the Geneva Conference of Experts thought that at certain distances, from about 620 miles to 1,240 miles from the source of an underground event that seismic signals would be very weak. The new data indicate that stations in this shadow zone, as it is called, pick up signals somewhat stronger than had been estimated. The size of the zone is now considered somewhat larger; the signals are delayed, and determination of first motion is not usually considered possible, but the strength of the signals are greater.

At the coming hearings of the Disarmament Subcommittee I shall be interested to learn in more detail both the positive as well as the negative aspects of the new data. We are inviting the top world experts to testify. This is not a matter which will be left entirely to the Conference at Geneva. The Senate must have the necessary information on this very difficult and technical subject. That information will be provided by our subcommittee hearings.

POLITICAL FACTORS ADDED TO TECHNICAL

The detection and control system, however, is not merely a matter of science. Science and scientists are important and vital elements in any disarmament agreement. But technical facts should not alone, by themselves, determine what course should be followed. A control system for the detection of nuclear weapons tests or for any other disarmament measure is much more than a mechanical device. The control system would consist and must consist of much more than scientific instruments. There also must be the right of inspection of suspicious events. The Geneva Conference recognized this factor when it stated: "The Conference considers that whatever the precautionary measures adopted by a violator he could not be guaranteed against exposure, particularly if account is taken of the carrying out of the inspection at the site of the suspected explosion."

SYSTEM MUST DETER: CANNOT BE FOOLPROOF

We must recognize that no system can be made absolutely perfect, absolutely foolproof. But knowing that perfection is not attainable this does not mean that we would be relying on good faith in any test ban agreement. We are attempting to construct a control system that will deter a violator because he can never be sure that he will not be caught. This is the same principle that must apply in maintaining our national defense. No matter how many bombs or missiles we may have, we can never say we have achieved absolute security. We do need to have enough weapons and have them sufficiently varied and have sufficiently trained personnel to use them, to try to deter a potential aggressor from starting any kind of a war.

The Subcommittee on Disarmament stressed this matter in one of its reports. The report unanimously stated that—

> Examination of numerous disarmament proposals reveals none that can be said to be absolutely foolproof against evasion * * * it would be deceiving to the American people and the people of the world to advertise any plan as perfect.

The subcommittee proceeded to say:

> Every proposal entails risks; risks as to the possibility of clandestine evasion and as to military security * * *. The basic question is to decide whether the risks of doing something to curtail the threat of war by reducing armaments are less than the risks of doing nothing and allowing the armaments race to continue indefinitely * * *. We must try to obtain the most secure agreement possible, which will give this country and the free world a greater degree of security from war than now is the case.

It is important that our negotiators should proceed to try to negotiate a treaty. We must not belittle the new data received. But neither should we go to extremes and conclude that it will not be possible to have an effective system to monitor an agreement to suspend nuclear weapons tests.

In our effort to set up an effective control system we must make whatever improvements are deemed feasible and warranted. The Conference of Experts agreed to provide that the international control organization should put into effect a scientific research program, with the aim of raising the scientific standard of the system. For example, there should be consideration given to a proposal to have nuclear tests—of equal number from the United States, United Kingdom, and the U.S.S.R.—undertaken under international control for the purpose of furthering research and knowledge in this field.

I discussed this matter at considerable length with the political leaders in the Soviet Union. I also discussed the matter of nuclear tests with the Deputy Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union, Mr. Kuznetsov, who was the spokesman for the Soviet Union in the Surprise Attack Conference in Geneva. I felt it was important that there be some firsthand discussion of the matter for purposes of information.

WHAT ARE THE RISKS?

Let us also keep in mind that the risks we are taking if we sign a treaty to discontinue nuclear tests do not threaten our actual survival. Are we giving up all our bombs—nuclear as well as conventional? No, not one will be lost. Are we giving up our missiles, or even our testing of missiles, in this proposed agreement? No, we can keep what few we have, and unless another agreement is negotiated we and the Soviets can keep on producing and developing as many missiles as money, brains, and energy permit. I suggest we get busy.

We can still keep producing all the nuclear weapons our tests and research have thus far developed. So really we are not engaged in a risk which entails our survival.

The risk in this agreement is that we would curtail our development of nuclear weapons insofar as further tests are necessary to develop improved designs. There is also the risk that the Russians will cheat and will not get caught. Our Government claims that we now are ahead of them, both in nuclear weapons production and in the number of tests held to date. If the Russians did cheat, how many tests might they conduct, and would they all go undetected? Even with very small tests where the probability of detection might be small, the possibility of a violator being detected would increase with the number of tests conducted. Given the right of inspection, are the Russians so clever and are we so stupid that they would not be caught?

WARNING TO THE SOVIETS

In encouraging and urging our negotiators to continue to try to negotiate a test ban, I believe the Soviets should be dealt with firmly. They must know that there are two conditions for a test ban treaty that must be present. I have made it quite clear in my conversations with the Soviets that these conditions are imperative. One is that there must be no veto by them, by us, or anyone else, which prevents an investigation of the source of a suspicious signal. The right of effective inspection must be preserved. We should be prepared to submit to this. And so should they. The Russians keep calling for equality. Well, on this we should be prepared to have equal treatment: no veto for us; no veto for them. If they do not accept this principle, then the negotiations cannot be fruitful.

The second condition is that there must be some way to improve the control system as flaws in it are observed. The results of our recent underground tests probably are indicative of the amount and type of information that can be learned about the interior of the earth and the effects and characteristics of manmade explosions as well as earthquakes.

I may add that the methodology which is required for high altitude explosions also needs to be further improved and explored. High altitude explosions need a most careful type of detection system. It seems as though many improvements will be needed. I would even think that some modifications of the system created by the scientists last summer might be undertaken. If the Russians refuse to look facts in the face, if they refuse to consider any of the ways to improve the control system, then this is an indication that they will reject any improvements in the future. If this is their attitude we should know it now.

These views I have expressed to the Russian negotiators when I was in Geneva last fall. I have expressed them unqualifiedly also to Premier Khrushchev. I said to them, and I repeat now, that any agreement which lends itself to evasion will only increase tension and provoke hostility. It is my view that no agreement is preferable to one that would be ineffective.

I also said that the world has a right to expect the nuclear powers to come to an agreement which is sound and enforceable. Such an agreement can be arrived at.

WHAT ARE THE POSSIBLE GAINS?

In conclusion, I want to stress that we must look at the advantages of a controlled suspension of nuclear tests in addition to assessing the risks. If a test ban agreement is reached it will be the first break in the arms race since it began several years ago. It could pave the way to further progress in reducing and controlling the weapons of war. This surely is needed. I believe it would help reduce the terrible tension that now exists between the free world and the Soviet bloc. It may make possible a more rational discussion and negotiation of other problems which divide the world into hostile camps. It would be a major political breakthrough, a major change in the concept of an Iron Curtain that is drawn between us and the Soviet people.

If the negotiations are to fail, then it must be the intransigence of the Soviets which is the cause. Failure must not be charged to us. We must continue to negotiate to see if an agreement can be reached.

Mr. President, the world is concerned about this arms race. While it is imperative, so long as the race continues, that we be strong, united, and prepared, I think it is equally important that the best talent of our country be dedicated to finding a just and an enduring peace.

I sometimes wonder if we really devote as much time to finding ways to peace as we do to finding ways to the moon and to outer space. I think it would be a good question sometimes to ask ourselves how much time, money, energy, and sacrifice we devote to finding ways to a just and enduring peace as compared to the time, money, energy, skill, and resources which we devote to the terrible weapons which threaten the life of God's creation, that we put into, even, the exploration of outer space.

I have said before that I think the real problem in the world is not outer space; it is inner man. The sooner we do something about man and man's relationship to his fellow men, the sooner we shall be able to do much more about man's relationship to outer space.

During the delivery of Mr. HUMPHREY'S speech,

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator ask me to yield for a question?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. I notice that there are no Republicans on the floor. The junior Senator from Louisiana has been threatening to abolish the Republican Party if the Republicans do not arrange to keep at least one of their Members on the floor. It seems to me that if we southern Senators can be in attendance to try to save the Confederacy, a Member of the Republican Party should be on the floor to save the Republican Party. I do not wish to be unfair to the Republicans, if they cannot have one of their Members present on the floor of the Senate. However, it seems to me that, since the Senate can do anything by unanimous consent except amend the Constitution, it would be a very simple matter to abolish the Republican Party by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am always keenly interested in making worthwhile public improvements. However, in this instance, a friend of the Republican Party asked me to protect his rights. He is now entering the Chamber. I am protecting his rights.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may say that the Senator from Minnesota is an honorary sheriff of my county. He is licensed to carry a gun, but he is not licensed to steal. I know the Senator will always protect the Republican Party, which has been so generous with him year after year.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is so right. This display of friendship and bipartisanship is in keeping with the spirit of the afternoon. I wish to assure the Senator from Arizona, even though my good friend from Louisiana had a thought which for the moment tempted me, I, in good conscience, did not take the suggested action.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad to hear the Senator say that the motivation came from the Senator from Louisiana, not as a result of the 8-hour conference the Senator from Minnesota had with the man across the sea.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It came from the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am pleased to see at least one Senator who is ready to save the Republican Party. As I looked around the Chamber I was afraid for the moment that no one would rise to save the Grand Old Party. I am pleased to note that the Senator from Minnesota, in one of his gratuitous gestures, has undertaken to save the Republican Party before someone could decide to abolish it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad the Senator used the word "gratuitous," not questionable.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this colloquy be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR REFORM

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have read with great interest the remarks of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] which accompanied the introduction of his revised version of the Kennedy-Ives labor reform bill. These remarks contain certain assertions and implications upon which I would like to comment.

Before doing so, however, I wish to advise my colleagues that within the next few days the President will send to Congress his proposals in this field of legislation and that I, as the ranking Republican on the Labor Committee, shall be happy to introduce the bill embodying these proposals.

The statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, referring to his bill, asserts:

> This is a bipartisan measure on a nonpartisan subject.

I should like to ask the Senator if his bill is being cosponsored by any of the members of my party. I note that he refers to an approving letter he received from ex-Senator Ives, of New York. In my opinion, the support of the ex-Senator does not any more transform this measure from a partisan into a bipartisan one than it did last year, when its sole Republican sponsorship came from the same ex-Senator from New York. I am confident that when I introduce the administration bill, it will be found that Senators on this side of the aisle will give it their wholehearted support.

It is a nonpartisan subject. We want to treat it that way. But I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that honest difference of opinion does not create partisanship. I have sat with him on the McClellan committee and watched and listened to the unfolding of this sordid drama. That our approach to the solutions differs from his does not mean partisanship. It means sincerity in our efforts to give to union members and to the public and to management real relief from the abuses now practiced on them.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Massachusetts states:

> It carries out all of the previously unfulfilled recommendations of the McClellan committee.

I wish to point out most emphatically that the new bill, like its forerunner, the Kennedy-Ives bill of last year, again fails to carry out several of the most important recommendations of the McClellan committee:

First. The new bill does not permit the States to exercise jurisdiction over labor cases which the Labor Board itself has refused to entertain.

Second. It does not impose fiduciary status and character on union funds and union officials handling those funds.

Third. It does not provide democratic voting processes for unions on important matters other than the election of officers.

All three of these were included as recommendations by the McClellan committee, in its interim report, which both the junior Senator from Massachusetts himself and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] signed, and thereby endorsed. All three of those recommendations were omitted by the junior Senator from Massachusetts from his bill.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts is emphatic in his insistence that his bill deals "primarily with the problems of dishonest racketeering." At this point let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether there is any such thing as honest racketeering—and that it is not a bill on industrial relations, dealing with the problems of collective bargaining and economic power. Those words would seem to indicate that no revision of the Taft-Hartley Act is contemplated in his bill. However, the Senator admits that he has included Taft-Hartley Act amendments "which are necessary to curb racketeering or to facilitate the NLRB's action in this area." He then goes on to concede that he has included other Taft-Hartley Act amendments "such as those dealing with economic strikers and the building trades, which are included as part of last year's package at the insistence of Secretary Mitchell and the Labor Committee's ranking Republican, Senator SMITH of New Jersey."

I am delighted at the Senator's willingness to accept Taft-Hartley Act amendments because they have been recommended by the administration and members of the Republican Party, even though they have no bearing upon the problem of racketeering.

But if the junior Senator from Massachusetts is genuinely desirous of cooperating with the administration in his expressed objective of having the Congress enact a bipartisan labor reform bill, why does he fail to include in his bill any provisions imposing necessary limitations on secondary boycotts and certain completely unjustified types of minority picketing? Proposals to correct these two evils were contained in the administration bill last year. They will be in the administration bill this year; and I am confident that the McClellan committee, on the basis of its recent hearings, will recommend remedial legislation dealing with secondary boycotts.

These proposals, unlike those on voting by economic strikers and the building trades, are absolutely essential to any effective curb on racketeerings and racketeers in the labor movement. Anyone with even the slightest familiarity with the racketeering activities of some of the unions investigated by the McClellan committee is aware that the secondary boycott and the minority union picket line are two of the most effective devices used by corrupt union bosses to further their nefarious objectives.

In his statement, the Senator from Massachusetts declares:

> Failure to pass effective reform legislation at this session may please the Hoffas, the Dios, and their ilk. It may please those on the other side who are chiefly interested in keeping a whipping boy alive.

Mr. President, I wholeheartedly agree with the junior Senator from Massachusetts that effective reform legislation must be enacted at this session. But I simply fail to understand how anyone who professes to be deeply concerned with eliminating corruption and racketeering from the labor movement can overlook those proposals of the administration which effectively deal with racketeering and yet accept other administration proposals which are totally unrelated to this problem.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to advert to one other matter in connection with the remarks of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. In reading his statement it seemed clear to me that it implied that his bill has the approval of the distinguished chairman of the rackets committee, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], with whom both of us have the honor of serving in our attempts to root out corruption and racketeering in the labor and management field. This perplexes me. Senator MCCLELLAN has declared that he will shortly introduce proposed legislation in this area. I understand that it will include provisions dealing with the secondary boycott and minority picketing, as will the administration's bill, but will go far beyond the latter in imposing on unions additional limitations, prohibitions, and sanctions which the Senator from Arkansas feels are necessary to solve the problems of corruption and racketeering. It is hard for me to understand how the junior Senator from Massachusetts can say that his bill "is broader and stronger than any alternative proposal in this area." Does he mean that it is broader and stronger than the forthcoming bills of the administration and Senator MCCLELLAN? I know that this cannot be so with respect to the administration bill, and I have every confidence that it is equally inaccurate with respect to the McClellan bill.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to refer again to a statement made today by the junior Senator from Massachusetts, when he said:

> It may please those on the other side who are chiefly interested in keeping a whipping boy alive.

I should like to repeat what I said earlier, namely, that our desire is only an honest, sincere desire to cleanse the labor movement. I am sure the junior Senator from Massachusetts has the same desire. I have great respect for his intentions in this field. But ours is a difference of belief as to how we should go about it. It is not a difference of politics. I, as a Republican, do not want to see this session end or many more months pass without the enactment of an effective labor bill. But I should like to start this discussion by making it perfectly clear that my objection to the bill of last year was not based on politics, and my objections to the Kennedy approach of this year will not be based on politics. They will be based on sound reasons and the administration's opinions as to what is the best approach to this issue.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, speaking of "keeping a whipping boy alive," I should like to recall an incident in the late 1940's, when I was a Member of the House of Representatives. Certainly at that time the Taft-Hartley Act issue was an example of "keeping a whipping boy alive." When the 81st Congress convened, and when there was then in the House of Representatives a very large Democratic majority—practically the same as the one now in the House—composed of Members who had campaigned on the pledge, "We will vote to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act," on a teller vote only 24 Members of the entire House walked between the tellers who were counting the number of Members who were voting in favor of repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. That is what happened then in the House of Representatives.

On the other hand, when the able junior Senator from Massachuestts [Mr. KENNEDY] was a member of the House Committee on Labor, he voted against repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wish to pay my respects to the Senator from Arizona as one of the stalwarts of his party.

It seems to me that the Nation is entitled to have conservatives as well as liberals. I have always felt that the Republican Party was a conservative party in America, insofar as any party can be called that; and I mean it in the best sense of the word.

I have felt that a conservative is one who wishes to preserve the better things of the Nation. The Senator from Arizona is certainly of those.

The Senator from Arizona is very anxious to reform the labor movement, and I believe there should be some reform. Last year, I voted for the labor bill. In that bill were a number of very fine provisions which should have been enacted. One of them that I have in mind was the provision in the bill which provided that if a man was a criminal and had been convicted of a felony and was ineligible to vote by virtue of that conviction, he could not hold a responsible position in the labor movement so long as he was ineligible to vote by virtue of his conviction of a felony.

I have in mind a very important labor leader who has several times been convicted of armed robbery, rape, and other crimes of a very significant kind. I assume he would be ineligible to vote. I have no knowledge that he has been pardoned for his several convictions. He could no longer exercise his great power if the Kennedy-Ives bill had passed. There is one example of what could have been done if the bill had become law, but as a result of the bill having been defeated in the House, that man continues to wield very great power in the labor movement. There is more than one such labor leader. There probably are 50 or 100 in the Teamsters Union alone who would be able to wield great power regardless of convictions.

Another provision in the bill related to labor leaders who received handouts from contractors or other persons with whom they did business, which would undoubtedly be payments in return for favors or perhaps some other activities between those involved which were in conflict with the public interest. Such individuals would have to report the handouts.

The Senator knows of the prominent business man who gave Mr. Beck gratuities, ostensibly. I think they were in payment for favors given. Nothing of a criminal nature could be done about the situation when it was exposed.

That was another one of about 17 significant provisions in the bill. Perhaps the bill did not go far enough, but I believe the Senator from Arizona will perhaps join with me in agreeing that it was regrettable the House of Representatives did not go along with the Senate after the Senate passed the bill by a vote of 88 to 1.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In answering my friend from Louisiana, I should just like to state that the House held no hearings on the bill. Many of us on this side of the aisle who felt that there were in the bill commendable provisions, but who felt that the Kennedy-Ives bill should have some corrections or omissions, wanted to have the House committee hear witnesses on the bill and, in their judgment, improve the bill. Not having done that, I think the House did the wise thing.

I believe the Kennedy-Ives bill did, in some cases, clear certain areas in the union movement which needed clearing. However, I need only remind my friend of the dangerous situation that, once a bill is passed that deals with labor reform, no matter if the bill is mild or a very weak bill, in all probability it is the last such bill that will pass the Congress for a long time, if we go on the record of Congress' not having been able to amend the Taft-Hartley law since 1951.

That is the point of my concern. If this were an issue that our colleagues would face up to repeatedly and make whatever corrections were necessary, I would have no hesitancy in saying, "Yes. If this is the best we can do, let us do it." But I do not want to walk out of the session and say the best we can do is the Kennedy-Ives approach, because with such a law I am convinced we shall never stop Hoffa, we shall never slow down Beck. Unless we provide against secondary boycotts and picketing, the law will never give the protection which businessmen and this country need.

Mr. LONG. It seems to me we are expecting too much if we hope to solve every problem in a single bill. A lot of persons wanted amendments to the Taft-Hartley law, which have never been achieved. I came to Congress the last day of the 80th Congress. One of the first things to happen in the 81st Congress was an effort to repeal the Taft-Hartley law. Actually the proposal was not a repealer. It would have left in the law a provision about jurisdictional strikes and other provisions which were undoubtedly needed in the Taft-Hartley law. It was not actually a bill to repeal.

Senator Taft at that time proposed 23 significant amendments to his own handiwork. He said he was convinced these would be reasonable modifications of a law which he had authored.

Subsequent to that time there has not been the leadership or the unity necessary in the Senate to put through the very proposals which Senator Taft himself made as amendments to his own handiwork.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will yield, I should like to remind my friend that in 1954 revisions of the Taft-Hartley law were voted out of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, brought to the floor of the Senate, and the entire Democrat side of the Senate voted to send them back to the committee. That is the genesis of my worry; once we pass something which has the title or the name of labor reform, I think it will become law for a long time.

I have just as sincere a desire as does the Senator from Massachusetts to get at the root of the problem. I do not want to hurt the labor movement. I do not want to destroy the labor movement. I want to see labor unions protected. I want to see the public protected. I do not want to see power in the hands of union leaders which can ignore the rights of the workingman and deny to people the rights they have.

If we continue in this way, union power is going to become the No. 1 power, and the people are going to be faced with that question. Power is wrong, no matter whether it is in the hands of management, in the hands of labor, or in the hands of Government here in Washington. The way we are headed in this country today, I am afraid we are headed in those three directions, with an attitude of "public be damned."

I know the Senator from Louisiana does not want that to happen in this country. Let me compliment the Senator from Louisiana for his comment on the need for conservatism in this country. Americans have come to look at the word "conservative" with suspicion. Those who started out to discredit conservatism have done a good job. The word "liberal" has become to mean an angel with wings, flying around the country, giving our money away, bankrupting the country, concentrating the power of Government here in Washington, destroying the concept of the Constitution, our Bill of Rights, and the Declaration of Independence. We conservatives—and I include the Senator from Louisiana as a conservative—are struggling to preserve only those things which are good. That includes the rights of the working people. It includes the rights of management.

I hope in my term in the Senate I can add a little dignity or prestige to a word which has been kicked around from pillar to post by people who want to destroy those good things in America.

I do not refer to true liberals. I refer to radicals who, in their concepts, whether honest or dishonest, are tending the Government toward centralization, who are tending the country toward bankruptcy. I am a conservative, and I am proud of being a conservative. If included in that definition is the preservation of the rights of the people which, in the McClellan committee hearings, have been shown to have been denied, then I am an even stronger conservative.

Mr. LONG. My definition of a liberal would be one who believes we must have changes for the better. I rather doubt that any person on the Senate floor is entirely a conservative or entirely a liberal. My guess is that most Senators—and I include my friend from Arizona—are desirous of a change for the better and at the same time for preserving most of our ancient standards, rights, and privileges.

By use of these terms "liberal" and "conservative" we sometimes hang labels on people which are inaccurate.

I say to my good friend from Arizona, my fear is not so much that we will fail to do everything we should like to do or will not do too much, but instead that we will have the same end result as we had in the previous Congress, of doing nothing. To me it would be a great failure, since I recognize the possibilities for constructive legislation, to insist upon a more drastic bill than we can hope to get and then have one House proceed to thwart the will of the other House, as happened in the previous Congress.

The late Senator Taft made one of his great speeches against the bill to amend the Taft-Hartley Act, but in favor of his substitute bill, criticizing the labor movement for demanding all or nothing. I believe that philosophy is what we must guard ourselves against in this Congress. If we want to pass a good labor bill, let us try to agree on the best we can get. The bill may still lack something, but after we have voted, and have considered every amendment the Senator from Arizona and other Senators wish to consider, let us pass a bill, to see if we can get our friends in the other body to send it on to the President.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I assure my friend from Louisiana, not only as a Republican but as the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, that is precisely what I propose to do. I do not want to accept something which is weak, when something that is mild or strong can be placed in the bill in its stead.

This is not a political issue. I do not think it should become a political issue. I am convinced the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and I approach the basic parts of the bill in relatively the same manner, only varying by degree. It is a matter of whether the Senator from Massachusetts can agree with me or I can agree with him that his approach in the fiduciary field is the proper one. If I can prevail upon the Senate, my approach will be used. If not, the approach of the Senator from Massachusetts will be used. It is a step.

Nothing in any proposal I have ever made to this body could in any way hurt or destroy the union movement in this country. If the leaders of labor are afraid of their own members, they had better clean their own actions up.

PROPOSED EMERGENCY LEGISLATION FOR DEPRESSED AREAS

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I regret very much being necessarily absent from the Senate floor last Saturday when my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] introduced two bills excellently tailored to provide relief in those areas of our Nation where literally hundreds of thousands of our countrymen are living at the lowest possible level of subsistence. While the legislation proposed by Senator COOPER would apply to the United States as a whole, I, like my colleague, am thinking of those tragically depressed areas of my State of Kentucky.

It is a pleasure to associate myself with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and my other colleagues in cosponsorship of these bills, and I invite the attention of the Senate to my colleague's pointed remarks when he introduced the legislation. His remarks appear on pages 771 and 773 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 17, 1959.

One of the bills, S. 423, would amend the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 to provide funds to accelerate construction of highways in labor-surplus areas. It would authorize apportionment of $100 million to those States designated as labor-surplus areas by the Defense Production Act of 1950. Last year, as Senators will recall, the Congress approved accelerated apportionment of $400 million in highway funds as an antirecession measure. S. 423 would authorize apportionment of $100 million of funds already appropriated for use in highway construction in areas suffering acute unemployment.

The Commonwealth of Kentucky is utilizing every means at its disposal to alleviate distress in eastern Kentucky. Already 25 counties, involving 200,000 people, have been placed on disaster status by Governor Chandler. Prime consideration has been given to highway construction in the affected areas, and Mr. Ward Oates, Kentucky Commissioner of Highways, has assured me that the engineering work has been completed and the rights-of-way acquired for nearly $50 million of primary and secondary roads in eastern Kentucky under the Federal-State ABC fund-matching program. Kentucky already has raised its share of this $50 million through the sale of highway bonds and is anxious to initiate a vast program as rapidly as possible.

This highway construction program not only would furnish an immediate source of gainful employment to hundreds of jobless men, but would also provide better roads in an area where transportation difficulties are a roadblock to economic development. Only this morning, Governor Chandler and representatives of the London-Laurel County Development Association were to get together in Frankfort on a program to employ 200 men to build and improve roads and do landscaping work in Levi Jackson State Park in southeastern Kentucky.

The second bill, S. 489, strikes to the heart of a matter which is a paradox in our land of plenty. This measure would amend Public Law 480 to give priority to our own people in the distribution of surplus agricultural commodities. The present law extends top priority to the sale and distribution of our surplus food products to foreign countries. I believe this should be changed to give primary benefit to our hungry and needy here at home. S. 489 also would direct the Secretary of Agriculture to spend $50 million this fiscal year and $100 million in fiscal 1960 to purchase additional food to supplement the school lunch program and the food quantity currently made available to the needy. The money would come from funds accumulated under section 32 of the law of August 24, 1935. Such expenditures would insure a better balanced diet for thousands of needy men, women, and children. Malnutrition is a critical problem, and it is difficult to justify a bare minimum subsistence in the face of our farm surpluses.

Kentucky has shown a substantial recovery from last year's recession. For many areas, the recession was just a temporary setback, but in the mining region of eastern Kentucky the recession simply heaped poverty on top of economic conditions already undergoing sorely troubled times. Twenty-five counties in the coal fields have been certified for emergency relief—relief in the way of food and clothing to continue what amounts to day-to-day survival. The area comprises a region to which recovery will not come overnight. Considerable effort has been made, and will continue to be made, to attract industry to this section, but it is necessarily a long-range prospect. The mountainous terrain of eastern Kentucky is detrimental to attracting the interest of industrial prospects. A comprehensive flood-control system is just getting under way, but the present flood threat, compounded by steep and narrow valleys and a relative scarcity of flat land, has been a deterrent to industry. The lack of an adequate highway transportation system also is a restricting feature to industrial expansion. The terrain is discouraging to agricultural expansion.

Declining coal production has brought starvation and its consequences to the coalfields of eastern Kentucky. The loss of traditional coal markets to competing fuels, particularly natural gas and imported residual fuel oil for power-generating purposes, has had a most depressing effect on the industry. While this alone would naturally reflect in decreased employment, other factors must be considered as aiding and abetting the present condition.

Rising production costs have forced mine operators to turn to mechanized mining processes in order to stay in business. Mechanization, thus, has reduced employment rolls. The employment situation has been worsened by the return of several thousand Kentuckians who had left the mountains for employment in the industrial centers of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois. Stripped of their jobs by last year's recession, they have returned home. Now their unemployment benefits are exhausted or nearly exhausted, thus adding an extra burden on the communities suffering the worst distress.

The immediate hope is for assistance to help the distressed areas through their present predicament, followed by development of aggressive programs to provide a measure of long-range stability. The legislation introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] extends the immediate hope for justified and deserving assistance. Many fine organizations, in cooperation with State and Federal agencies, are engaged in developing programs which will stimulate long-term recovery. I am hopeful that we will accomplish both goals.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate January 20, 1959:

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY

Norman P. Mason, of Massachusetts, to be Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Mark 9: 27: With God all things are possible.

Almighty and ever-blessed God, Thou art willing and able to do for us exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think.

Inspire us to believe that none of the Christlike longings which Thou hast planted within our souls are too lofty to be fulfilled by Thy divine wisdom and power.

Enlarge and expand our minds and hearts with a faith that defies despair and a love that casts out fear.

Hear us in the name of the Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

ECONOMIC REPORT — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 28)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Joint Economic Committee and ordered printed, with illustrations:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 20, 1959.

To the Congress of the United States:

I present herewith my Economic Report, as required by section 3(a) of the Employment Act of 1946.

In preparing this report, I have had the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers. I have also had the advice of the heads of executive departments and independent agencies of the Government. I set forth below, largely in the language of the report itself, what I consider to be its salient conclusions and recommendations.

ECONOMIC RECOVERY IN 1958

When the Economic Report was submitted to the Congress in January 1958, a contraction in production and employment that had started some 6 months earlier was still under way. The decline proved to be sharper than the 1953–54 recession, but it did not last as long. A recovery began in May 1958, and by the end of the year most of the ground lost had been regained. Gross national product, our broadest measure of the Nation's output of goods and services, was at an annual rate of $453 billion in the fourth quarter of the year. In dollars of constant purchasing power, this was almost equal to the highest output attained in the prerecession period. Nearly a million more people were at work in December 1958 than in July, after allowance for seasonal changes. Although the number of persons unemployed was above 4 million in December, it was 1 million below the highest unemployment figure reached during the recession. Wage and salary income and consumer spending were at an alltime high, and the index of consumer prices had been virtually stable for 6 months, although about 2 percent higher than a year earlier.

ECONOMIC POLICIES IN 1957–58

The events of the last 18 months show again the considerable capacity of our economy to resist contractive influences and to hold a downturn within fairly narrow limits.

Many factors contribute to this capacity. Chief among them are the industry and resourcefulness of our people, the strength and resiliency of our free competitive institutions, and the continuing operation in the American economy of powerful forces making for long-term growth.

Also of importance are features of our economic system that moderate the impact of contractive influences on personal income, and thus help to maintain demand. Increasingly, our people work in industries and occupations that are not readily affected by moderate economic declines. And such reductions in income as do result from lower production and employment are offset, to a considerable extent, by supplementary payments, notably by those made under the Federal-State system of unemployment insurance.

Governmental actions also played an important role in moderating the recession and helping to bring about a prompt and sound recovery. Monetary and credit policies were employed vigorously to assure ample supplies of credit. Legislation was enacted to lengthen temporarily the period of entitlement to unemployment benefits. Numerous actions were taken to spur building activity. Steps were taken to accelerate Federal construction projects already under way and to speed up projects supported by Federal financial assistance. Activities under a number of Federal credit programs, in addition to those in the housing field, helped counter the recession. And the acceleration of defense procurement, which was being undertaken in line with national security policy, exerted an expansive effect.

The 1957–58 recession shows that the major emphasis of Federal policies to counteract an economic downturn should be placed on measures that will act promptly to help shift the balance of economic forces from contraction to recovery and growth. Though an effective contribution can be made by the acceleration of public construction projects already under way, little reliance can be placed on large undertakings which, however useful they may be in the longer term, can be put into operation only after an extended interval.

The 1957–58 experience is also a reminder that there is no simple prescription for corrective action which can be applied with only minor variations in every business downturn. It emphasizes the importance, in a situation in which powerful corrective forces are at work, of avoiding hasty and disproportionate actions, such as tax reductions that needlessly endanger the prospects of future fiscal balance and prejudice the orderly revision of the tax structure.

As production, employment, and income moved upward in 1958, the economic policies of government became increasingly concerned with keeping the recovery on a sound basis and promoting a sustainable long-term expansion. Monetary and credit policy was shifted with a view to limiting the expansion of bank credit to a sustainable pace. The large financing operations of the United States Treasury are being conducted with a view to enhancing the basic stability of our financial system and promoting sound economic growth. And the fiscal operations of government are moving in the direction of restoring a balance between outlays and incomes and thereby countering potential inflationary tendencies.

THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

As 1959 opens, there is reason for confidence that the improvement in business activity which began in the second quarter of last year will be extended into the months ahead. Factors that influence decisions on business capital outlays have become more favorable, and an upturn in these expenditures may already be under way. Residential construction outlays should contribute further to economic expansion, especially if favorable action is taken by the Congress on recommendations made in the report to provide a steadier and more assured flow of private funds into mortgages. Sales of U.S. products in foreign markets may increase as the pace of business activity abroad quickens and the trade position of primary producing countries is improved. The combined outlays of Federal, State, and local government units will continue to rise. Under the impact of these developments, the liquidation of inventories should soon come to an end; indeed, the gap between current sales and stepped-up production schedules may already have been closed. The effect of these favorable factors on employment and income can be expected to enlarge the markets for consumer goods and thereby to reinforce the conditions making for overall economic expansion.

A PROGRAM FOR ECONOMIC GROWTH WITH STABLE PRICES

Our objective must be to establish a firm foundation for extending economic growth with stable prices into the months and years ahead. This will not come about automatically. To attain our goal, we must safeguard and improve the institutions of our free competitive economy. These are basic to America's unassailable economic strength. We must wage a relentless battle against impediments to the fullest and most effective use of our human and technological resources. We must provide incentives for the enlargement and improvement of the facilities that supplement human effort and make it increasingly productive. Finally, an indispensable condition for achieving vigorous and continuing economic growth is firm confidence that the value of the dollar will be reasonably stable in the years ahead.

Action to meet these challenges is required on many fronts, by all groups in our society and by all units of government.

The individual consumer can play an important part by shopping carefully for price and quality. In this way the American housekeeper can be a powerful force in holding down the cost of living and strengthening the principle that good values and good prices make good business.

Businessmen must redouble their efforts. They must wage a ceaseless war against costs. Production must be on the most economical basis possible. The importance of wide and growing markets must be borne in mind in setting prices. Expanding markets, in themselves, promise economies that help keep costs and prices in check.

Leaders of labor unions have a particularly critical role to play, in view of the great power lodged in their hands. Their economic actions must reflect awareness that the only road to greater material well-being for the Nation lies in the fullest realization of our productivity potential and that stability of prices is an essential condition of sustainable economic growth.

The terms of agreements reached between labor and management in wage and related matters will have a critical bearing on our success in attaining a high level of economic growth with stable prices. It is not the function of government in our society to establish the terms of these contracts, but it must be recognized that the public has a vital interest in them. Increases in money wages and other compensation not justified by the productivity performance of the economy are inevitably inflationary. They impose severe hardships on those whose incomes are not enlarged. They jeopardize the capacity of the economy to create jobs for the expanding labor force. They endanger present jobs by limiting markets at home and impairing our capacity to compete in markets abroad. In short, they are, in the end, self-defeating.

Self-discipline and restraint are essential if reasonable stability of prices is to be reached within the framework of the free competitive institutions on which we rely heavily for the improvement of our material welfare. If the desired results cannot be achieved under our arrangements for determining wages and prices, the alternatives are either inflation, which would damage our economy and work hardships on millions of Americans, or controls, which are alien to our traditional way of life and which would be an obstacle to the Nation's economic growth and improvement.

The chief way for government to discharge its responsibility in helping to achieve economic growth with price stability is through the prudent conduct of its own financial affairs. The budget submitted to the Congress for the fiscal year 1960, which balances expenditures with receipts at a level of $77 billion, seeks to fulfill this responsibility. If Government spending is held within the limits set in the proposed budget, the growth of our economy at the rate that may be expected would make it possible in the reasonably foreseeable future to provide, through a significant further step in tax reform and reduction, added incentives and means for vigorous economic growth and improvement.

Governmental actions in other areas can also help to maintain price stability as our economy expands. The Congress will be requested to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to make reasonable price stability an explicit goal of Federal economic policy, coordinate with the goals of maximum production, employment, and purchasing power now specified in that act. Steps will be taken within the executive branch to assure that governmental programs and activities are administered in line with the objective of reasonable price stability, and programs for the enlargement and improvement of public information on prices, wages and related costs, and productivity will be accelerated.

The many continuing programs of Government that promote the expansion and improvement of our economy will be administered vigorously. Also, new legislation will be requested to strengthen competitive forces, to enhance personal welfare, to promote integrity in labor-management relationships and to foster better industrial relations, to assist local areas experiencing heavy and persistent unemployment, to make more effective use of the large Federal expenditures relating to agricultural price support, to promote conditions favorable to trade among nations, and to assist in the economic growth and development of the free world.

Favorable consideration of these legislative proposals by the Congress will materially help to achieve the goals of vigorous, orderly, and sustainable economic progress within a framework of reasonable price stability.

All of our people, in view of their broad common interest in promoting the Nation's economic strength, can fully support this program.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House in the 86th Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORNBERRY assumed the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). The Chair recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

THE LATE ARTHUR E. COOK

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, it is always with much sadness that we pay tribute to the passing of a great friend and a great man.

A few evenings ago Arthur E. Cook, better known as Gus Cook, passed away suddenly in his apartment.

I am taking this moment to do what I want to do, that is to pay tribute to one of the finest men it has ever been my privilege to know, one of the most capable men that I have ever worked with in all my experience.

When Gus Cook was asked to do something he went about the task and always did a swift and efficient job. Few men could have passed away around this Capitol that I would miss more than I will Gus Cook. He was my friend. He was around the Capitol for 61 years, and during all my years here I have known him for his generosity, for his kindness, for his great humanitarian qualities. Shall I miss him? Yes; terribly, and for always.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the distinguished Speaker in his tribute to Gus Cook. It was my privilege to know him for a great many years. He was a very thoughtful man, one who was always looking out for the welfare of the Congress which he dearly loved. I know of no man who, during the years, has been more devoted to the House than Gus Cook. He was always careful, when we had our joint sessions, in making the necessary arrangements to protect the President, whoever he might be. So conscientious was his work there was no need of a check. Through his years of experience you always knew what to do. He was a gentle soul. He was a man who tried to be helpful to all Members and aided many of us over a difficult hurdle. It is with great regret that I note his passing. I was in Massachusetts and did not know about it until last night and the word came as a great shock. I join with the good Speaker in this eulogy to a faithful servant, who has finished his labor on this earth and passed on to his reward. The world was better for having men like Gus Cook.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, as some of you may know, I came to this body as the result of a special election held just 24 years ago this January 29. When Mrs. Halleck and I came to Washington we stayed first at the Roosevelt Hotel. One of the first persons I met around here was Gus Cook. I saw much of him during the time we lived at the hotel. I saw very much of him as I worked here in the House of Representatives. At that time there was but a handful on our side, and I was the newest of the new. I observed that Gus Cook was helpful to the older Members, the people to whom he was directly responsible, but he likewise was very helpful to me, and I appreciated it through the years more than I can say. He was one of the most kindly, thoughtful gentlemen that I have ever known. No task was too difficult; no task was too minor for him to undertake. He was my friend.

I was saddened to learn of his passing, but I must say for those of us who knew him and loved him and respected him and admired him, we can all take some measure of comfort in the knowledge that he set a great example for all of us; that we are all better for the fact that he was here with us. He lived a great and full life. He was a happy man right down to the last day here with us, which was where he wanted to be, and working with us, which was what he wanted to do.

So sorry am I that he is gone. But, I also realize that for all of us he has made our experience here much happier and much better, and I am sure he has made a great contribution to the welfare of the country that he loved and served so well.

To the loved ones he leaves behind I offer my heartfelt sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, there is not much more that can be added to what the Speaker and former Speaker and the minority leader have already said. But, I want to express my personal feelings in the passing on of Gus Cook. It was only a few days before he died that I met him for the last time accidentally as we both met each other walking through the corridors of the Capitol. Between Gus Cook and myself throughout the years there has been an association which will always be treasured on my part. In addition to the qualities already referred to by the previous speakers, which have been alluded to in a broad way but which I will pinpoint, Gus Cook was a good man.

I think the finest compliment anyone can pay me is to say that JOHN McCORMACK is a good man. I think the finest compliment I can pay any person is to say that he is a good man or a good lady. It is not a question of position or power or influence. It is a question of a state of mind. If a person is good, he or she is good, whether they live in a small community, with a small circle of friends and neighbors, or a large community with a large circle of friends and neighbors. But if a person is good to their neighbors, whether a person has tremendous wealth or has very little of the material things in life, if they are good, he or she is a good man or lady in relation to their fellow beings, to their neighbors.

Gus Cook, above all his other fine qualities, was a good man. That is the impression that he has left in my mind and which I shall always have. He was an inspiration to me during the years we knew each other.

I know I speak the sentiments of all of my colleagues who knew Gus Cook that when I express my deep feeling of sympathy in his passing, I also express their feelings.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. BONNER.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, Arthur E. Cook was born October 23, 1873. He came to employment at the Capitol of the United States on November 6, 1898.

Arthur Cook, affectionately known by all of us as "Gus" was my neighbor in an adjoining or a connecting apartment at the Roosevelt Hotel, for more than 10 years. Mrs. Bonner and I came to love Gus, and I am sure he loved us.

A fine way to know the virtues and character of a man is to live near him, or live with him. I had that privilege. I know that his whole desire in life was to be here at the Capitol. He lived so that we could live more in comfort, so that we could have the things that we desired as far as it was possible for him to give them to us.

He was a congenial, wholesome, kindly person. He appreciated the friendships that he made here in this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, his spirit will walk through the corridors of the Capitol for years and years to come; will walk in these places that he held dear in his heart and will be with the membership of the Congress, those of the past, of the present, and of the future as the years go on.

It can truly be said that he was a devoted custodian of this building and a devoted friend of the people of this country in seeing to it that their Representatives here in Congress had the best that could be provided for them from the Office of the Architect.

Mr. Speaker, I shall miss him as I know you and many others will. I extend my deep sympathy to his family and to his close friends. We have lost a true friend.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who may desire to do so may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD regarding the late Arthur E. Cook.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to pick up last Friday night's Washington Evening Star and find an account of the sudden death of my dear friend, Gus Cook. Gus was always kindly to me over the years since I arrived in Washington, and we had many confidences and pleasant hours together. The Capitol will miss Gus Cook after his employment here for 61 faithful years. He was a fine gentleman.

I join in mourning his loss, and extend my sympathy to his daughter, Mabel, in her bereavement.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the memory of an individual who served for many, many years in an important position in the Capitol of the United States and whose death has brought sadness to all of those who knew him, and particularly to those such as myself who had the privilege of knowing him closely through a period of many years. "Gus" Cook was one of those rare individuals whose conscientiousness and devotion to duty set an example for all who came in contact with him. Through close personal relationship over a long period I had the opportunity to observe in him those characteristics which deserve emulation by all who serve our Government. My sincerest condolences go to his surviving family.

AID TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, in 1957–58 there were more small business failures in the United States than at any time since 1933–34. There are many reasons for this. Small business is not able to receive adequate financing from bank and loan institutions. The Federal tax bite is so great that it substantially reduces the amount of investment that is available to the small businessman for reinvestment purposes. These factors do much to reduce the incentive of the small businessman to stay in business.

A way that the Federal Government can aid small business is through the use of a liberal tax adjustment. It should be pointed out that this adjustment will aid many businesses which would otherwise fail. Furthermore it should be pointed out that by encouraging and aiding small businessmen to stay in business we are doing much to protect the consumer, bolster our system of free enterprise, and prevent monopolistic practices on the part of big business.

Consequently, I am introducing a bill which will allow a tax reduction on small business earnings that are plowed back into the business. The bill, simple in construction but far reaching in scope and effect, provides for a deduction from taxable income of either $30,000 or 20 percent, whichever is the lesser, of net income that is reinvested in business. My distinguished colleagues the gentleman from Texas [Mr. IKARD] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] have introduced similar bills to aid small business.

WHEN SHALL I PROVIDE FOR MINE OWN HOUSE ALSO?

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing in Congress two pieces of proposed legislation that would seek to help our own, native-born, flag-following, community-building families of this country in all those depression ridden areas where prosperity has, like the priest and the Levite in the parable of the Good Samaritan, passed by on the other side.

These bills of mine, these proposals, are companion measures to Senate bills introduced last week in the Senate by my colleague and fellow Kentuckian, Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER, who happens to live in my own congressional district. He and I well know and thoroughly understand the people of the Kentucky mountains, where we both have hundreds of relatives and friends and where we have seen all the deprivations and underprivileged conditions at first hand.

The bills I am introducing, previously introduced in the Senate by Senator COOPER, will cost neither the taxpayer nor the Government any additional money whatever.

One of these bills would simply authorize an allotment of $100 million of previously appropriated highway construction funds to those States where there now exist surplus labor areas, as designated by the 1950 Defense Production Act. This allotted sum would be apportioned to surplus labor areas in the ratio which the unemployed in those areas bears to the total of unemployment in the entire Nation. In other words, this bill is a leveler that would smooth out the peaks of prosperity so as to fill up some of the valleys of depression throughout the country. This bill is not a "tax increaser" but it is a "jam provider for the lower shelf" out of some actual jam that is already in the Government pantry.

My other bill, also a companion measure to a Cooper bill in the Senate, would provide certain priorities in the disposal of surplus foods accumulated by the Government under its price support program. The present law provides for priorities in the sale of these surplus food items to foreign governments, but my bill would switch the priority so that it would be in behalf of the needy people of our own country. This would make available not only additional supplies of food but a greater variety of food, including potatoes, beans, and cooking oils not heretofore available. This bill would especially benefit schoolchildren eating at their school lunchrooms in all the depressed areas of Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and in other States of our Nation.

In the Book of Genesis of the Bible, we find Jacob asking Laban this pertinent and patriotic question, "When shall I provide for mine own house also?" And as we now think of our Government having already spent over $70 billion for the benefit of many persons who would gladly trample our flag under foot 24 hours each day, it is now pertinent and patriotic to ask, "When shall I provide for mine own house also?"

A PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT FOR A BALANCED BUDGET

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to introduce in former Congresses a bill to force a yearly balanced budget, and again I do so most happily. In view of the President's statement, and other statements made by Members of the House, I think it is very apparent that we must have a balanced budget in order to prevent inflation and to keep the dollar bill worth 100 pennies. For this reason, I introduce this bill again, not knowing too well, of course, of its progress through this House, but fully believing that it is most necessary.

The American people can have economy in Government and a sound dollar if they really want it. When the folks back home insist that their Government be operated with the same fiscal responsibility that they must display in their own homes and businesses, we can have a balanced budget without in any way impairing or jeopardizing national defense. This bill, originally introduced in the Senate by Senator BYRD of Virginia and Senator BRIDGES of New Hampshire, provides the means by which much conspicuous waste and unnecessary spending may be eliminated. Short of war or national emergency, this bill forbids Congress to spend more in any fiscal year than it anticipates taking in.

The bill does not limit spending as such. If Congress wants to appropriate more money than the Government expects to receive in taxes, this amendment would not allow Congress to adjourn until it levied the additional taxes necessary to provide the money.

I am afraid that some of the people are accepting the glib explanations that national defense and the interest on our debt largely account for the overwhelming and inflation-spawning budgets. This simply is not true. We are spending less on the military than we did in 1953, while nondefense spending on all sorts of welfare and grab-bag programs has risen more than $9 billion during the same period.

I believe in a balanced budget. I think the President's message to us states better than I can the reasons for it. I hope my colleagues will join in this so that we will have a forced balanced budget as a constitutional amendment.

CLEVELAND VA REGIONAL OFFICE MAINTAINS OPERATING ECONOMY WITHOUT SACRIFICING SERVICE

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I am today inserting in the RECORD a very interesting report on what our Veterans' Administration has been doing in Cleveland. We apparently have a man of very fine ability who is reducing the number of people and increasing the amount of work.

Mr. Speaker, the Veterans' Administration can well be proud of the work accomplished in its Cleveland regional office during 1958. This office has jurisdiction over 38 northern Ohio counties, wherein reside more than 715,000 veterans.

I have just received a copy of the annual statement of the regional manager, Col. William Holsinger, which shows that in spite of an abnormal addition in casework during the past year, this office was able to operate with greater economy than in the previous year without sacrificing quality of service.

Colonel Holsinger and the men and women who serve under him have every reason to be proud of their endeavors. Their record and achievement should be both a stimulus and a challenge to all departments of our Government.

Believing that my colleagues will be interested in reading the statement in its entirety, I ask under unanimous consent that it be included as part of my remarks, as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
REGIONAL OFFICE,
Cleveland, Ohio, January 9, 1959.

ANNUAL STATEMENT

The economic recession prevalent in this highly industrialized area during the year

1958 was not without impact on the Veterans' Administration. Any cycle of unemployment creates in affected war veterans an immediate interest in their benefit possibilities. Consequently, the processing facilities of this organization became increasingly exercised accordingly.

In spite of this somewhat abnormal addition in caseload, it will be apparent that for the period in contrast our continuing performance record costwise demonstrates an even more gratifying percentage of operating economy than that reported last year. This office has been reduced from an average employee roll of 552 in 1957 to that of 530 persons in 1958, or a reduction of 4 percent in staff personnel. Quality standards, however, have been increased during this belt-tightening device even in the face of increased workloads in most divisions of the station.

When it is recalled that the veterans' educational and vocational training program for World War II has not only long since passed the peak of its operation but, in fact, is moving along with that of the Korean veterans toward its legislative conclusion, the loss in student enrollment for the calendar year 1958 over that of 1957 is most inconsequential. The values of the GI educational bills are being highlighted more and more in the news of the day. Some of our most phenomenal achievements in space development, the sciences, medicine, and in the fields of political and community activities, are products of our graduates of the GI educational program. It is with considerable pride that we report recent surveys revealing many of the beneficiaries of the GI bill having more than repaid the cost of their education through taxes paid on their increased earning power.

Congress enacted the GI loan extension with its higher interest rate of 4¾ percent in April 1958, and later on in the past year loan applications revived to average 400 per month. If this trend is maintained, at least 5,000 loans in 1959 are clearly foreseeable. Worthy of note is the record of GI homes purchased by the Veterans' Administration through foreclosure. As of January 1, 1959, the Cleveland Veterans' Administration regional office owned 39 homes out of a total of 70 properties thus far acquired through veterans' defaults. When it is remembered that more than 97,000 loans have been granted, this represents a default record of less than one-tenth of 1 percent, thereby pointing to a truly remarkable payment reputation for the veteran homeowners in spite of the economic recession.

The very substantial increase in veterans' claims processed by the adjudication division in 1958 over that of 1957 represents a corresponding impact on the administrative division of the office in that more than 44,700 active files were added to the management records during the year 1958.

Our management studies continue in the field of mechanization with the objective of introducing more electronic data processing systems into our operations. By July 1, 1959, our finance division will have been fully converted to punchcard operation for benefits payments. Increasing numbers of our statistical reports and other essential budget and operational data are rapidly being brought into IBM processing systems with even greater progress anticipated during 1959.

The area under the jurisdiction of the Cleveland regional office includes the 38 northern Ohio counties on a line extending from Belmont County on the east to the southern boundary of Defiance County on the west, wherein reside more than 715,000 war veterans serviced by this office.

	Year ending—

4. Grand total of running award benefits to veterans	79,814	81,808
5. Number of medical examinations and treatments	134,150	157,260
6. Total number of active veterans files for all purposes in Cleveland regional office at end of year (under records management 1,750 inactive files were disposed of during year 1958)	786,770	830,474
7. (a) Average number of beneficiary checks issued per month	96,019	98,069
(b) Average monthly beneficiary payments	$5,933,974	$6,282,272
8. Average number of employees	552	530

The Veterans' Administration is conscious of the heavy responsibility it bears in the task of expending with maximum efficiency the funds entrusted to its use, but it is equally aware of its acknowledged stewardship in the field of veterans' care and benefits. A grateful country, anxious to provide the maximum of rehabilitation and restorative treatment for those who have devoted substantial segments of their lives in war, demands faithful and conscientious performance of the terms of this trust. In this enterprise we wholeheartedly dedicate ourselves and such talents as are ours.

A MESSAGE

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in this RECORD a poem which I hope you will all read. It is a translation of a poem written in prison by a Hungarian. It is one of the most tragic things. It is a picture of his own experience—it is a true experience. I trust all of you will read it and hope for better things in this world.

The poem is as follows:

THEY'VE WALLED UP EVERY WINDOW

(Translated by Watson Kirkconnell from the Magyar poem of Tibor Tollas)

(Free world. To you in this verse our voices come: to you we call, we tens and hundreds of thousands of Hungarians who sojourn in the hell of prisons. Our tongue falters too much in our dungeon and millions do not know what the poet says. Foreign poets, our brothers, translate us into the languages of your peoples, so that our message may reach you. While in 1955 in Pest the Communists were spouting about legality, in the Vác prison they sealed up the windows with sheet metal, so as to take away even that much air and light.)

Of life without, only this gleam was left,
A tiny patch of stars, a glimpse of sun.
In daily gloom, within dim walls bereft,
We watched the vent for this as day was done.
This too they stole, this streak of sunlight thin,
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

In memory's eye, I mark the azure sea
At Naples, and beside the shining shore
Vesuvius waits and smokes. Can you, like me,
See happy, sun-browned swimmers by the score?
We live in night like men who blind have been:
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

Our ten mouths gasping for the missing air,
Ten of us lie, in one close kennel pent,
As fish gills on the bank might gasp despair.
To eat the food, which stinks of excrement,
Our stomachs lack the power to begin:
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

From the bright fragrance of the Alpine peaks
The west wind blows freshness of bouquets;
Of virtue to the soul that distance speaks,
And smiling summits swell the hymn of praise.
But phthisis grips my cellmate, dark as sin,
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

For us no more the steamer's whistle blows;
All maiden laughter from our sense is wiped;
No pleasure in our ears sonorous flows;
No summer plays an organ, myriad-piped.
Our oells are deaf, all sound is dead herein:
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

By Barcelona, in garden fair,
The warm voice of a tawny woman croons;
The streets are pied with dancers here and there;
A gay guitar gives dusk its tinkling tunes.
Our leaden days flow silent in chagrin:
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

We probe in darkness towards the velvet skies
As if within a coffin we were nailed,
We only touch our rags and agonize
Or feel our hands by vermin-hosts assailed.
We once caressed the sunlight, like soft skin.
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

There is a ball in London; like a rose
A girl glides, in her silks, on floors that gleam;
In all the bloom of lustrous hair she glows,
Soft-mirrored in the wainscot, like a dream,
The West is dancing. Has it Magyar kin?
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

Our tongues recall the pleasant taste of spring
Then swallow with a groan our morsel dank
Whose fecal horror chokes its entering
And turns our bellies sick, our reason blank;
Yet even this our famine forces in
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

Sleep locks our hungered bodies in its spell,
And there I sate a gourmet's appetites
On all that Paris offers—see as well,
Climbing above the city's neon lights,
The silent ghost—but here no dawns begin:
They've walled up every window tight with tin.

The radios shout hoarsely of new deals,
Of freedom and of justice due to man,
But here my dungeoned body only feels
The million lashes of foul Moscu's plan.
From Vác to far Peking his slaves make din:
Beware! Beware! Or through the entire world
They'll wall up every window tight with tin.

WASTEFUL USE OF PRIVATE PROPERTY BY GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note that plans of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to take over six or seven floors of one of the Arlington Towers apartments have struck a snag.

I call the attention of the Appropriations Committee to the fact that thousands of square feet of space in Arlington Towers is now being used by the Defense Department to operate a military training institute and the State Department to operate a Foreign Service training school.

I am further advised that no provision is being made to house the Foreign Service training school in the huge, new State Department building when it is completed.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that space for these activities can be made available in the Pentagon and other Government-owned structures, and I urge the Appropriations Committee to take a thorough look at these and other rental contracts.

I will have more to say on this subject at a later date, but I would remind the House that the United States Treasury is now borrowing billions of dollars and this is no time to be reckless with the taxpayers' money.

HOW TO CHECK ON GOVERNMENT WASTE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this time is taken so that I may express the appreciation of the Republican Members of the House and I assume of the Speaker, and certainly of all of the older Members on the Republican side to the gentleman from Iowa. We who have been here in prior years know that if and when a Government executive or a department begins to waste money in big chunks, the gentleman from Iowa is always here with the facts. Personally, I have been able to avoid a great deal of hard work by just coming here and listening to his statements of fact. He reads the reports that are put out by committees. He reads the documents that come up from the departments. He reads the news. Personally, all one needs to do is to get the advance information from him as he speaks from the well as to where this waste threatens, and if you check, as sometimes I have, you will find that he is accurate about the expenditures which cause the tax burden of which our people so justly complain. So if an older man may be permitted to suggest to the newer people anything that will help permit me to say, just listen to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS], and if any wasteful and extravagant items that you should vote against are coming up you will learn where they are and the amount of each. The gentleman renders a very necessary and valuable service.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read by the Clerk:

JANUARY 20, 1959.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to section 8002 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the following members of the Committee on Ways and Means have been designated as members of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation: Hon. WILBUR D. MILLS, Hon. AIME J. FORAND, Hon. CECIL R. KING, Hon. DANIEL A. REED, Hon. RICHARD M. SIMPSON.

Sincerely yours,

WILBUR D. MILLS,
Chairman.

ELIMINATING USE OF TAX LOSS CARRYOVER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANIK] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to eliminate the use of tax loss carryover—a gimmick which is currently being used as a tax escape hatch which costs the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars in lost tax revenue.

In full view and with almost nodding approval of the Internal Revenue Service, we today witness the spectacle of the Studebaker-Packard Corp. seeking to merge or marry its $134 million tax loss carryover with companies seeking to divert a like sum of profits from the Federal tax collector. In this one case, efforts are being made to bilk the Federal Treasury of at least $70 million. This is done by the simple process of merging companies with $134 million profits to Studebaker-Packard's $134 million tax loss. Result, no income taxes due on the $134 million profits.

Studebaker-Packard's tax manipulations are currently being managed by a national expert in the tax dodge—Abraham Malcolm Sonnabend, of Boston, Mass., who has a long list of achievements in converting corporate tax losses into profits. The tragedy is that almost every dollar of these skillfully maneuvered profits is a dollar which would otherwise flow to the Federal Treasury.

Under the present income tax law, a 12-month period is the normal one for balancing profits and losses. The gross income of a 12-month period must be balanced against all the deductions properly attributable to the same period. However, the law was subsequently amended to permit the net operating losses of the period to be offset against the profits of earlier or subsequent periods. At present the law permits net operating losses of 1 year to be carried back and set off against the profits of each of the 3 preceding years and carried forward against the profits of the 5 succeeding years. The present provision applies only to net operating losses for taxable years ending after December 31, 1957. For the years 1954 to 1957 losses may be carried back only 2 years instead of 3 years.

There is equity in the principle of profit and loss carryback and carryforward, provided the privilege is retained by the same corporation, so that it may balance off good years against poor years.

It was never contemplated that the privilege of balancing off losses against profits would develop into a national business of such tremendous scope. Under the present Internal Revenue Code, it is possible to acquire all of the stock of a loss corporation—like Studebaker-Packard—and put new business ventures into that corporation and have the loss offset the profits of the new corporate acquisitions. The only requirement is that the loss corporation continue to carry on the identical business that it carried on before the acquisition.

If the ingenuity and talents of our corporation tax experts were diverted to our Nation's missile and space problems, we would already be engaged in interplanetary shipping. Too many of America's best brains are involved in scheming tax-saving profits. Too few are imbued with the patriotism involved in preserving national fiscal integrity by creating and preserving fair and equitable tax policies.

Unfortunately, too many of our tax laws have built-in, tax-escape routes, either unforeseen or deliberately ignored by public tax architects. If we expect to achieve fiscal integrity, if we expect national respect for the equity and justice of our taxation system, the floodgates must be designed to prohibit the flight of profits from rightful taxation. We could readily achieve a balanced budget and substantially reduce our Federal debt, if there were universal respect and compliance with the principles of just taxation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. I would remind the gentleman from Ohio that at the close of World War II I did what I could to kill the carryback clauses when we killed the excess profits tax. They failed to do it, as I anticipate they will fail to do in the gentleman's efforts to kill the carryback clauses in the present law. Their failure to do that cost the Treasury of the United States $2,900,000,000 in supplemental appropriations.

I sincerely hope the gentleman from Ohio succeeds, and I am sure he will have the support of myself and numerous other Members of Congress in an effort to break up this raiding of the Treasury.

Mr. VANIK. I thank the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia. I commend him for his long interest in this tax avoidance problem.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman knows I come from Indiana. Studebaker Corp. has been a going concern out there for a great many years—I think over a century. A lot of people in Indiana are very much interested in the success of the Studebaker-Packard Corp.; it is a matter of tremendous interest in South Bend and the surrounding area, including part of the area I am privileged to represent.

Is the proposal of the gentleman designed to possibly bring about the final and complete elimination of Studebaker-Packard from the automotive business?

Mr. VANIK. That is not my intention at all. On the contrary, I want to assure the gentleman that my only purpose is to eliminate the use of accumulated Studebaker-Packard losses to other corporations that are subsequently acquired. The acquisition of profit companies by a loss corporation under present law, in effect, results in a subsidy from the Federal Treasury for the continuance of its business operations.

I think Studebaker-Packard is a fine corporation and I wish it luck and good fortune in its continuance in the automotive industry. I particularly hope that its new automobile will be very successful.

But I do not believe that loss corporations should be permitted to buy profit corporations for the sole purpose of enabling these profit corporations to have their profits escape the taxes normally assessable under internal revenue laws. I think that as far as the loss carryback principle is concerned it should be available for use only by the same corporation. In other words, I think that if Studebaker-Packard has some profitable years ahead—and I hope it does—its losses under the suggested amendment would be chargeable only against its own profits and not against subsequent or later acquired corporations, acquired solely for the purpose of permitting them to escape their proper tax obligations to the Federal Government.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am somewhat familiar with the Studebaker company, though perhaps not in the same business, but when we used to purchase hubs and spokes and things like that for farm wagons.

Does the gentleman think the officers of the corporation are getting too much money?

Mr. VANIK. I did not say that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I know that; I am just asking the gentleman.

Mr. VANIK. I do not know; that is for the stockholders to determine. I only protest the fact that under existing law corporations having tremendous losses, generated either from within or without their control, can offset that loss by buying corporations that have good profit returns and thereby permitting the acquired corporations to avoid paying proper taxes on their profits.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I read in the newspaper this morning or yesterday that the president of American Motors received $200,000 last year for salary. That seemed to me like quite a sum. Of course, the Government took all but $65,000 of that and I was wondering about a man getting $200,000 and then the Government taking all but $65,000.

Mr. VANIK. I believe in the progressive tax system; the gentleman does not have any argument with me on that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not know whether we do or not.

Mr. VANIK. I understood the gentleman to be talking about the amount withheld.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I was just wondering whether the tax rate was high enough—$200,000 and take away all but $65,000.

Mr. VANIK. In my amendment, I am only concerned with the tremendous sums of money which are permitted to escape the Treasury under the device by which a corporation with tremendous losses acquires corporations with tremendous profits. That is the sole purpose of the amendment which I submit.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does the gentleman think the union organizations should pay a tax on the moneys they collect?

Mr. VANIK. I think we ought to review the entire Internal Revenue Code in every Congress, as we are doing through our Committee on Ways and Means, to see that taxes are properly and equitably applied, and so that the equity of our tax system is maintained.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is the gentleman receiving letters from telephone people who are kicking about that tax?

Mr. VANIK. I certainly am. I am getting letters from practically every holder of stock in the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. asking me to vote against an excise tax on telephone calls.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It is not the stockholders who write me; it is people who use the telephone, the old men and women who want to get their groceries by phone.

Mr. VANIK. I tell a great many of them that I fear if the tax is repealed by the Congress we would suffer the same result that we suffered when we repealed the excise tax on freight. The tax went off all forms of freight, the Federal Government lost critically needed revenues, and the citizens throughout the various communities of the country had no gain. I fear that if we were to repeal the excise telephone tax it would not take more than a few weeks before the telephone companies moved in and raised their rates so that they would take the 10 percent instead of the Federal Government.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then the unions would come along and would also want more money, too.

Mr. VANIK. That has happened in a great many areas in which we have provided tax reduction. But I think that is collateral.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does the gentleman know of any way we can reduce taxes unless we cut some of these appropriations?

Mr. VANIK. I agree with the gentleman that we must cut appropriations. I think we must follow that course simultaneously with the plugging of tax loopholes. We must see that we have an equitable tax system so that all of those tax revenues that are equitable shall be assessed and paid by those who are chargeable.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think we should also quit trying to tax people who cannot pay? Those are the folks who are writing me now.

Mr. VANIK. We should be constantly revising our tax structure to see that tax equity is maintained.

ADMINISTRATION'S BUDGET IS PART OF A GOP BOOBYTRAP SET FOR DEMOCRATS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Democrats now find themselves poised to step flatfooted into a huge GOP boobytrap.

Here is the big trap which the GOP high command has set up for us, expecting that by goading and guiding us a little here and there, we will stumble right into it.

First, the President's whittle-down budget is sent up, and he is issuing us a dare to increase it, even before we have had a chance to see what is in it, but knowing full well that we will increase it.

Second, at the same time the President was dramatizing this matter, going on television and radio to tell the American people that his budget must be supported, he was at the same time establishing in the public mind a hard-and-fast rule out of the GOP's handbook. Deficit spending causes inflation, he told the American people.

So, there we have it: The GOP's rule is laid down—every dollar of deficit spending will be a dollar of inflation.

And, of course, this public appeal was used to further establish the idea that inflation is the overriding issue of our time.

HOW DEMOCRATS WILL BE BLAMED FOR INFLATION

So here is what the GOP hopes will happen. And unless we take a careful look to find what the issues really are, and then do something about them, this is what will happen:

First, the Democratic Congress will increase the President's budget. Many of the Democrats expect to pass measures which they think will stimulate employment, such as a housing bill, a community facilities bill, and a distressed areas bill. Further, if on examination we find that the President's budget does violence to some of the important social programs, we will expect to restore the necessary appropriations for those; and if we find that the President's budget for defense seems inadequate, we will expect to increase appropriations for this purpose.

Second, there will be more price increases—that is, more of what the GOP is calling inflation. These increasing prices will not be caused by deficit spending, but the American people will think so. This highly incomplete and misleading notion is being drummed at the American people from all sides.

HOW GOP EXPECTS TO WIN IN 1960

Third, the new measures which this Congress passes in the hope of bringing back full employment will not increase employment. The Federal Reserve System is holding the purse strings of the whole economic system, and it is pulling on those purse strings just tight enough to keep a level of unemployment of about 4 million.

So by appropriating more funds for housing, for community facilities, for defense, and so on, we will merely be opening the small-change purse down inside the big pocketbook which the Federal Reserve System controls. Our official money managers are standing ready to tighten the purse strings to offset and nullify the effects of any actions we may take. If we pass measures for specific programs, those programs will be carried out, yes. But total employment in the country will not be increased. The result will be merely an increase in these activities and an offsetting decrease in others. As we increase credit for particular fields of activity, the money managers will tighten credit, as they say, in general. In other words, they will tighten the money supply in the banking system, or raise interest rates throughout the whole financial system, so as to cut back demand for credit.

The impact of this general tightening is by no means general. Recent experiences have shown that certain segments of the economy—notably small business, the farmer, and the local construction programs, such as school buildings—are especially vulnerable, and actually bear the brunt of these general credit squeezes, and big business is touched not at all. Nevertheless, our money managers are able and ready to hold down the total level of business activity and employment.

In conclusion, the embarrassing consequences of the trap the GOP high command has set for us will be these: First, we will increase the Federal budget and then be blamed for causing inflation; second, our actions will not have accomplished what they were supposed to have accomplished, namely, to bring back full employment, and we will thus be accused of causing inflation and increasing the public debt without having produced any good result.

I would remind the Democrats that on election night Mr. Meade Alcorn announced that the GOP campaign for 1960 would begin on November 5, 1958. Here it is; the campaign is on, and here is the boobytrap by which we can lose.

If we avoid this boobytrap, we will have to do two things. We will have to find out what the money managers are doing, what they intend to try to do, and what they can successfully do with the tools and authority they now have. In short, we need a full investigation of the monetary and debt management system.

TWELVE MEN DECIDE THE NATION'S PROSPERITY AND EMPLOYMENT

Here we should keep in mind that the Nation's money and credit policies are determined by a committee of 12 men. These men make up the so-called open market committee of the Federal Reserve System. None of these 12 men is an elected official of the Government. Five of the members are Federal Reserve bank presidents and are selected by the private bankers. The other seven are the seven Federal Reserve Board members. These are, of course, appointed by the President, although there is some thought that the recommendations and the influence of the private bankers may also have a bearing on the selection of these individuals.

It might be added, as an aside, that at the present time there is one vacancy on the Board, and one member is incapacitated because of illness, so the open market committee is evenly divided between public members and bank members.

The credit policies decided upon by the open market committee are executed by the Federal Reserve System. This is done by adding to or subtracting from the credit available in the private banking system, or by juggling interest rates throughout the financial system. Interest rates are determined principally by the prices at which the open market committee buys or sells Government securities.

The Federal Reserve System adds to or subtracts from the amount of credit available in the private banks in any of several ways.

First, it adds to bank credit by increasing its portfolio of Government securities which it buys in the open market. Or it may sell securities and thus reduce the money supply.

Second, the Federal Reserve may reduce the percentage of reserves which the private banks are required to keep against their customers' deposits—to increase the money supply. Or it may increase the percentage of reserves, to reduce the money supply.

The Federal Reserve Banks may also make loans to the private banks, and discount the loan paper of private banks—to increase the money supply. In practice, however, loans and discounts are not of great significance in the money supply.

EXAMPLES OF CHANGING THE NATION'S CREDIT SUPPLY

Let me illustrate some recent changes in the money supply of the whole country which the Federal Reserve deliberately and consciously brought about.

As a rough working rule, the total money supply is considered to be the amount of demand deposits in the private banking system, plus the amount of currency in circulation outside of banks. In July of 1957 the total demand deposits and currency, on a seasonally adjusted basis, was $136 billion. By January of 1958 it had been reduced to $132.2 billion. Remember now, this is on a seasonally adjusted basis, so the reduction which the Federal Reserve brought about in this period was not one to offset changes in seasonal demand for credit.

Then, by November of last year, after the determination had been made to bring the level of business activity back up to near prosperity levels, the money supply had been increased to $138.5 billion.

It might be well to note also that the business recovery which started in the middle of last year has paralleled the open market committee's buying of Government securities.

The prolonged credit squeeze which was begun in 1955 was accomplished largely by the open market committee's reducing its portfolio of Government securities, selling these securities in the open market. In 1955 the open market committee's average holdings were $23.9 billion, as compared to an average of $24.8 billion in the preceding 18 months. Remember now, this was in a period when the population was growing and business activity was increasing. The supply of goods and services to be traded was increasing, so a growth in the money supply was needed—not inflation—but an increase proportionate to the increase in goods and services.

In 1956 and 1957 the open market committee continued to reduce its portfolio somewhat, to an average of $23.3 billion in 1957.

Then, from a low of $23.2 billion in February of last year, the open market committee began to build up its portfolio. Its big actions were taken in May and June of last year when in these 2 months it stepped in the market and bought almost $3 billion of securities.

MONEY IS BEING TIGHTENED AGAIN; AND RECORD INTEREST RATES ARE TO BE RAISED HIGHER

At the present, however, our money managers are pulling pretty hard on the purse strings. If the Members noted the account of Government bond prices on page A-20 of the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning, they will have noted the last Government bonds issued by the Treasury were being traded yesterday at a price which yielded 4.10 percent. Yields on long term Government bonds are now at the highest level they have been in more than 25 years.

The Members may have also noted that there are rumors in the market that the Treasury will shortly ask Congress to lift the ceiling on Government bond rates from the present statutory maximum of 4¼ percent. That maximum has been specified by law since World War I. I would not be surprised, however, if the Treasury does ask that the law be changed so that it can issue bonds at rates up to 4½ percent.

The administration's request now to raise interest rates on VA housing and other loans suggests that these new highs in Government bond rates are not expected to be just a temporary matter. And all of this administration's requests have been for higher interest rates, never for lower interest rates.

So, to repeat, the first thing we should do is find out what effects will be allowed to follow from any spending measures we might be considering. In short, we should have our long overdue investigation of monetary and credit policies. This investigation is provided for in House Resolution 50, which I will insert at the end of these remarks.

DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS MUST STOP GOP INFLATION AND DEPRESSION

The second thing we must do is find a better way of controlling inflation than it has been controlled—if we could say that it has been controlled at all—under this administration. Certainly, controlled inflation by so-called monetary controls has proved to be the most conspicuous failure of our times. Yet we are still being propagandized and urged from all sides to accept and to continue this method of disastrous failure.

Recently I wrote a brief statement for the Commercial and Financial Chronicle on this issue, as I see it. So if I may, I would like to read this statement. It contains something in the nature of a forecast which is also a hope of mine as to what this Congress will do about the central economic issue of our day. It presents a suggestion of the only way I know to avoid the boobytrap which the GOP high command has set for us Democrats and, I think, a boobytrap which will spell disaster for our country.

STATEMENT FROM THE COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL CHRONICLE

Some of the business journals are predicting that the new Congress will be antibusiness. Clearly it is the Democrats, not the Republicans, who will insist upon a full business recovery and a return to full employment, yet I think that in a certain sense the prediction may come true. Let us take the matter of where the Congress may turn for advice and guidance on the big economic questions of the day.

For several years now leaders in the business and financial community have been persuading themselves, and persuading the country, that only monetary controls are the proper instruments for guiding the level of business activity in the country. And almost equally, these leaders have campaigned for checking inflation—an objective with which almost everybody agrees. These propositions, together with a somewhat less firmly held notion that the Federal budget ought to be kept in balance, make up the main advice which the business and financial community seems to have to offer.

Yet by now it is clear to almost everybody that tightening money or raising interest rates succeeds in checking inflation, if at all, only when these brakes are applied so hard that the country is kept in a state of high unemployment and low production. Indeed, this method of checking inflation is presumed by its sponsors to succeed because a state of wholesale unemployment will operate as a psychological club against management's raising prices and labor's demanding wage increases.

How then can reasonable men square such an economic policy with Khrushchev's challenge to race with us in increasing production, advancing scientific knowledge and improving living standards? This is no challenge which we can accept or reject, but a race which we were aready running and from which we cannot retire; we can only win or be beaten. And the facts are that Russia's economy has been growing between 7 percent and 10 percent a year, and the Soviet's new 7-year plan calls for an average growth of 8 percent a year. In contrast our growth has averaged less than 2 percent a year during the Eisenhower administration.

Another point: while the country's business and financial leaders have insisted that Federal economic management rely almost exclusively on money and credit controls, they have been fully content that the money and credit controls in use are at least 40 years out of date, as is the legislative basis for these controls. Indeed, they have been opposed even to a congressional inspection and review of this machinery. The overdue investigation of the money and credit system must now be made, even though the country's business leaders—men who are reputed to be quick to adopt for their own businesses electronic quality controls and the most advanced instruments for inventory and other controls—continue to insist that instruments 40 years obsolete are good enough for the Federal establishment.

The recent recession has dramatized the point that inflation can result from either of two causes: it can result from increases in the supply of money and credit outrunning the supply of available goods and services. This generally means, though, that demand will be pressing upon productive capacity; and deficit Government spending is not itself inflationary, except that it increases demand at such times. The second cause of inflation is by all odds the more serious in the recent and present settings. This is the arbitrary power of big-business industries to raise prices—to meet wage demands, present or expected, or for any other reason. Each of several hundred corporate managements has the power to devaluate the dollar, by their routine price decisions, and frequently exercise this power. At the moment the officials operating the country's monetary controls seem to be probing for that level of unemployment which will serve as a satisfactory psychological club against such price increases; but it is apparent that the level of unemployment which will produce the necessary psychology at one time may not produce it at another. Indeed, we witnessed price increases being made last summer—when unemployment had risen to alarming levels—and being made by industries operating at no more than half capacity.

The central problem of Government today, as I view it, is to find a widely acceptable method by which high levels of production and employment and a rapid rate of economic growth can be maintained and at the same time maintain price stability. There is no longer a choice whether we shall have just one or the other. The new Congress must, it seems to me, design measures to deal directly with inflation, as well as measures to make very substantial improvements in the system of money and credit controls.

So it is in this sense that the new Congress will probably be antibusiness: it must look for economic intelligence and advice elsewhere from that offered by the central thinking of the financial and business community today. Or alternatively, the financial and business community must come forward with more constructive policies and suggestions. Personally, I hope the latter will be the case, but as yet there is little evidence to feed this hope.

H. Res. 50

Resolution calling for an investigation of monetary and debt management policies

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House shall appoint a Select Committee on Monetary and Debt Management Policies, to consist of eleven Members of the House, one of whom shall be designated chairman, which shall be authorized and directed to conduct full and complete studies and investigations and make inquiries with respect to any matter or matters concerning—

(1) the effects of changes in interest rates and the money supply on producer, distributor, consumer, and Government costs, including particularly the part played by policies of the Federal Reserve System and the Department of the Treasury in bringing about the increased cost of living;

(2) the effects of Federal monetary and public debt policies on the distribution of the national income as between the investor or money-lending functions and the economic contributions of wage earners, salaried employees and operators of nonfinancial businesses;

(3) the part played by the recent high-interest and tight-money policies of the President, the Federal Reserve System and the Department of the Treasury in bringing about the economic decline, unemployment and the slump in investment, credit purchases and consumer purchasing power;

(4) the part played by Federal high-interest policies in bringing about the increased public debt and the increased costs of carrying the public debt, including both the amount of the increased burden on taxpayers already realized and the probable amount of the burden in the years ahead;

(5) the effects of the recent high-interest and tight-money policies on the cost and rate of construction of school buildings and other facilities of the State and local governments, and on the expansion of State and local debt;

(6) the effects of recent actions of the Federal Reserve System which have allowed the private commercial banks to create many billions of dollars of new money, and thus to increase the Nation's money supply, including the effects on interest rates, consumer prices, and the volume of consumer and business borrowing;

(7) whether and to what extent effective and timely public management of the Nation's money supply and interest rates is hampered by the fact that the powers for controlling interest rates and the money supply are vested in two separate boards or committees within the Federal Reserve System, each with the powers to act independently;

(8) whether and to what extent the present system of having representatives of private banks serve on boards and committees within the Federal Reserve System to determine interest rates and credit availability in the private banking system, and in the money and securities markets, results in unduly high interest rates or in the use of methods for tightening or loosening credit which favor the private banks or other financial groups at the expense of the general public;

(9) whether or not the Federal Reserve System's present practice of buying and selling annually many billions of dollars' worth of securities of the United States in exclusive trades with a select group of private dealers, in nonpublic trading and at secret prices, and its refusal to deal in long-term securities represents the best method of managing the public funds used in such trading, or results in excessive private advantage to the favored dealers;

(10) whether and to what extent the expenditures and the handling of Federal funds and Federal securities by the Federal Reserve System and the Comptroller of the Currency might be made less wasteful and better safeguarded by requiring that these Federal agencies be audited by the General Accounting Office;

(11) whether and to what extent the powers which are vested in the Federal Reserve System, in the Comptroller of the Currency and in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to supervise or regulate private banks and banking practices, and the similar powers which are vested in the Home Loan Bank Board with respect to private savings and loan associations, are being used to dictate the private policies or to interfere unduly with the decision-making of these private institutions; and whether, and to what extent, such unwarranted interferences are making these private institutions ineffective to serve the credit needs of small business and the credit and other needs of the local communities;

(12) the policies, practices and effectiveness of other Federal banking and bank-supervisory agencies, including particularly the numerous duplicate and overlapping agencies that are making loans or grants of Federal funds for nondefense purposes to foreign governments, to foreign companies and citizens and to United States nationals doing business in foreign countries or exporting goods to foreign countries, such as the Export-Import Bank of Washington, the International Cooperation Administration, the Development Loan Fund, and the International Finance Corporation;

(13) the various types of Government securities, manner of issue, method of payment, maturities, the adequacy of the market for Government securities, character of dealers and investors, and the amount and degree of speculation therein, and the relative costs and effectiveness of issuing and pricing Government securities on a noncompetitive basis as compared to the competitive method of issuing and pricing Government securities; and

(14) the status and adequacy of the existing credit mechanisms in the United States, the growth of new institutional sources of credit that have arisen or substantially increased since the enactment of the Banking Act of 1935, and the effectiveness of present laws and present practices under existing laws to serve the public interest.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purposes of carrying out this resolution, the committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the continental United States, whether or not the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or by any member designated by such chairman, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Roger W. Jones, an Outstanding Public Servant

OF
HON. KEN HECHLER OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to commend President Eisenhower for nominating to membership on the Civil Service Commission one of the outstanding career civil servants of our time, Roger W. Jones.

In the span of three-quarters of a century since the establishment of the Civil Service Commission, there have been few commissioners better qualified by training and temperament than Roger Jones. He will bring to his new job a deep dedication, broad knowledge of governmental problems, and a certain zest for accomplishment.

Nearly 20 years ago I first met Roger Jones while he was serving as administrative officer of the Bureau of the Budget in Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration. There were several qualities which immediately stood out in his approach to his work. As a public servant in the highest sense of the word, he worked by the simple code of making the engines of bureaucracy carry out the public will.

There was a phrase which Franklin D. Roosevelt's Committee on Administrative Management used in 1939 which best describes Jones, "high competence, great physical vigor and a passion for anonymity." Working in high positions for Presidents Roosevelt, Truman, and Eisenhower, he displayed a remarkable ability to serve the institution of the Presidency without regard to political considerations. His respect for and understanding of the Presidency have been invaluable assets.

Roger Jones knows how to cultivate the best and reject the worst in the wonderland of bureaucracy. He can give direction and cohesiveness to a program which might otherwise get tangled in the molasses of the redtape sea. He has an instinct for the jugular.

I do not ever remember seeing Roger Jones when his eyes were not sparkling. When vast quantities of paper moved across his desk, he always seemed to have a freshness of approach to each new problem. He was never bogged down with work and always kept those sparkling eyes on the forest while he was chopping down or replanting the trees.

In the Civil Service Commission, he will have a much tougher job which will demand greater energy and leadership than his previous tasks. Will he be able to measure up? I have watched him also in the role of teacher, and here he has shown that he also has the necessary talents to make him a great educator.

Down through the years there have been great and mediocre members of the Civil Service Commission. The mediocre ones have been those who have tilted their swivel chairs slightly backward and allowed the vast Federal bureaucracy to run them. I do not think Roger Jones will be that kind of Commissioner. I believe he will grasp the reins of leadership.

Mr. Speaker, as a West Virginia Democrat I rise to pay tribute to this Connecticut Republican. The career service and the country are fortunate to have a man like Roger W. Jones to head the Civil Service Commission.

Address by Hon. George D. Aiken, of Vermont, at Plant-To-Prosper Meeting, Memphis, Tenn., December 18, 1958

OF

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on December 18, 1958, the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] delivered a most interesting address at the plant-to-prosper meeting in Memphis, Tenn. It contains a concise history of farm problems and legislative action over the past two decades.

In order that Senators may have an opportunity to read the address and benefit from the experienced analysis of this great agricultural statesman concerning the many farm problems discussed, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It was 18 years ago next month that I went to Washington as a Senator from my State.

Having lived on a farm all my life up to that time, it seemed to me a bit of remarkably good luck that I was assigned to membership on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The farm I had lived on comprised some 50 acres of woodland, pasture, and cropland. Today it would probably be called a subsistence farm.

It kept about five cows and produced some fruit and vegetables as cash crops.

We never raised any wheat or cotton or peanuts or rice.

There was usually an acre or so of corn and a half acre of cigar-leaf tobacco.

The half acre of tobacco got all the fertilizer and the buyers who came around every fall got all the tobacco at their own price—8 cents, 9 cents, 10 cents, or whatever they were willing to pay for it.

My efforts to raise peanuts and cotton ended in frustration.

The peanut shells didn't have any peanuts inside and the cotton proved to be ornamental only as it never got past the blossoming stage.

So, you see how well prepared I was to take my place on the Agriculture Committee headed by Cotton Ed Smith and which included veterans like Bankhead, of Alabama; Reed, of Kansas; Thomas, of Oklahoma; McNary, of Oregon; and Ellender, of Louisiana.

I started to learn something about agricultural politics almost the first month, being named to a subcommittee headed by Senator John Bankhead to hold hearings on the cotton-storage program.

Of course, I knew that a good share of our cotton farmers were producing about 200 pounds to the acre and sometimes more, and that it was un-Christianlike to expect them to sell that cotton for less than 10 cents a pound.

I had never given much thought to the storage program, however.

I didn't realize that ginning and compressing and storing was quite a good-sized business by itself.

At the very outset of the hearings, I learned that cotton storage wasn't just a simple economic system of carrying cotton over from 1 year to another.

I learned right away that there were big storage fellows at the ports and little storage fellows inland—at least that's what the witnesses said—and that there was some competition between the two.

It took me a little longer to find out that some of the big fellows also had a slight financial interest in the operation of the little fellow's facilities.

However, in real orthodox fashion the subcommittee set out to protect the little fellows.

Senator Bankhead was one of the most astute and lovable southern statesmen I ever knew. That means he was one of the astutest that there was anywhere.

It may have been his intuition and it may have been just his desire to see what the Yankee farmer from Vermont would do under certain circumstances that prompted him to leave me in charge of the hearing one afternoon.

No other member of the subcommittee was present.

I sat at the head of the table—little warehousemen sat on my left—big warehousemen sat on my right.

I felt pretty good at this display of confidence in me on the part of Senator Bankhead.

The hearing got under way and warmed up as it proceeded.

Pretty soon the sparks began to fly, my doubts began to rise and the practical results of that particular hearing was zero, except that I had had my first lesson in cotton diplomacy.

Since that first hearing in the winter of 1941, I have been on hearings relating to every conceivable agricultural program here and abroad.

I have heard expounded every possible theory which its author thought would promote a more prosperous agriculture for the United States—or at least provide some specific advantage for the group which he happened to represent.

I have seen candidates for public office rise and fall on the issue of national farm policies.

Farm issues have permeated every election campaign and occupied much of the time of the Congress.

Farm organizations and commodity groups have clashed with one another and frequently factions within the same commodity group have opposed each other bitterly.

The only time I have known all major farm organizations and both major political parties to work together for a single farm program was during the years 1947 and 1948.

About 6 o'clock in the morning of June 20, 1948, the Congress presented the country with a new farm program backed by President Truman and the Republican Congress and by every major farm organization.

The two main features of this program were flexible price supports running from 72 to 90 percent of parity and a new parity formula which was so constructed so that it was expected to work properly forever after.

What happened?

The flexible price supports were promptly suspended and until very recently only operated during the years 1951 and 1952, when the Korean war made price supports inoperative anyway.

The new parity formula was so completely outmoded within a few years that it became worthless as a yardstick for measuring the parity price of many commodities.

Possibly cotton is the commodity to which the new parity formula is most applicable today.

We have had some good years since 1941; we have had some lean years—but, as for developing a national farm program which will serve us successfully for an indefinite number of years ahead, we are just about as far from success as we were 18 years ago.

Of two things we may be sure:

First, that any farm program which we may devise today will not necessarily be applicable to conditions which prevail tomorrow; and, second, politics will never supplant economics as a means of promoting farm prosperity on a long-range basis.

In this year of 1958, in spite of acreage restrictions, soil-bank incentives, production controls and other devices, American agriculture is setting an alltime record for production.

Temporary surpluses of certain commodities have become greater surpluses and apparently less temporary.

Technology and biology have thwarted every effort of the Congress to control production by law.

There are basic economic laws which do not lend themselves to political maneuvering.

Personally, it makes me feel good to think that the United States is the most productive agricultural country in the world and that our troubles are caused by surpluses rather than shortages.

The other day I read a prediction that the population of the United States would increase 100 million in the next 20 years.

While this may be disputed, we do know that at the present rate of increase we will be called upon to feed and clothe this increased number in not over 30 years.

This is the reason that while we stumble over the problem of surpluses, we are also planning to not only bring more land into cultivation but also to greatly increase the productiveness of acres and animals.

Sometimes I wonder if we really have surpluses today.

Or are we, through sheer obstinacy in refusing to see the facts of life accumulating, in the name of surpluses, food and fiber which ought to be flowing freely in the markets of the world?

The United States produces exportable quantities of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and vegetable oils.

The rest of the world needs these commodities, but because we have for years refused to look at the situation realistically we have seen the tobacco capital of the world move to Africa, competitive cotton production develop in a dozen countries, and the production of wheat subsidized by people of other lands who ought to be looking to us for their requirements.

The year 1958 marks a milestone in the course of agricultural legislation.

I am not referring to the corn, rice, and cotton legislation enacted by the 85th Congress.

I refer to the fact that in 1958 we took off the blinders and recognized our farm problems for what they are.

The fact that we have surplus problems is a tribute to the American farmer.

The fact that for over 20 years we thought we could solve those problems through political action alone is no tribute to anyone.

Our political thinking simply has been unable to keep up with the technological and biological progress in the field of agriculture.

In a sense, the work of the 85th Congress was as constructive as that of any session since I have been in Washington.

It may be that the legislation we enacted will not be any panacea so far as the producer of cotton and other crops is concerned.

We did have the honesty to recognize the fact that some of the remedies we had advocated in the past had not effected cures.

We did acknowledge that medicine which might be effective in time of emergency was not always effective in maintaining the health of the patient after the emergency was past.

The 85th Congress did have the courage to break away from the orthodox political position that only high guaranteed prices and greatly restricted production can cure the ills of agriculture.

Imbued with this new found courage, the Congress enacted legislation which, with the approval of the producers, removes the restriction on corn production and will permit greater production of cotton and rice at a lower guaranteed price.

Right here, I want to pay tribute to the cotton producers and the cotton industry for taking the lead in this epic departure from a practice of 20 years' standing.

I want to pay tribute to the Memphis Commercial-Appeal and its ace farm reporter, Jerry Dearing—not only for an outstanding job of farm news coverage, but also for the fact that Jerry works constantly to improve the farming industry of the South and is frequently called upon by Members of Congress for information.

Heaven knows what a Member of Congress, with an experience with cotton as limited as mine or even a Member with the experience of my chairman, Senator ELLENDER, would do if we could not call upon the Rhea Blakes, the Jerry Dearings, and other leaders of the cotton industry from California to the Atlantic coast for help and information.

Heaven knows too what we would do without the fighting leadership of men like JIM EASTLAND when it comes to cotton legislation.

No one can possibly know how many times these men have been called upon for help by Members of Congress who would otherwise be left largely in the dark in working on such legislation.

For the full 18 years I have been on the Agriculture Committee, my relationship with the southern members and the southern chairmen has been a satisfying experience.

Let me say here that much of the success in getting new legislation through the Congress last summer was due to the perseverance and the courage of Chairman ALLEN ELLENDER.

You know, we did have difficulties here and there even up to the day the conference report was finally accepted, but as members of the Senate conference committee, Senators ELLENDER and EASTLAND never wavered in the position which you folks for the most part sponsored. I stuck along with them believing their position to be sound.

As to the legislation itself, I think it is going to be beneficial.

It ought to make it possible to restore cotton to its time-honored position as an export crop, to put our domestic mills in a more favorable competitive position with the foreign industry and to ease the pressure on other farm commodities by reducing the competition which they would otherwise incur from unused cotton acreage.

I don't guarantee that the new legislation which takes effect next year will do all that we hope for it.

I do guarantee this—if, after a reasonable trial, it appears that the legislation is not in the best interest of agriculture and the national economy, I will be glad to cooperate in improving it.

There are some impatient souls who probably can't wait to find out whether this new legislation will work or not and we may expect the usual number of panacea proposals in the next Congress.

One proposal which seems to be enjoying a resurrection is the proposal for production payments on all leading farm commodities, the theory being that if production payments work for sugar and wool why aren't they good for every other farm commodity, too?

The supporters of this proposal fail to take into account the fact that in the interest of national security we are trying to increase the production of wool in this country and that we are not self-sufficient in the production of sugar.

It would be quite a different matter to apply the rule of payments to surplus commodities.

The theory is, of course, that every farmer would produce his crop, sell it for what he could get and receive a check from the Government to make up the difference between the selling price and 100 percent of parity.

This plan was formally promoted 9 years ago by the then Secretary of Agriculture, although I understand that it was originated years before that in the minds of a group of agricultural economists.

I was strongly opposed to the Brannan plan in 1949, not because of the payments themselves but because the producer in order to receive such payments would be required to operate his farm and each acre of it in a manner approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The present restrictions on the planting on cotton, rice, tobacco, and other basic crops are comparatively mild in comparison to the controls which would have to be exercised over the producer under the so-called Brannan plan.

The cost of an agricultural program which even now is creating widespread resentment would be multiplied several times over under the reincarnated payments program.

My allusion to the resentment against the cost of farm programs does not refer to an imaginary situation.

The public looks at the total amount of the agricultural appropriations legislation.

They say, "Oh, the greedy farmer is getting $6 billion or $7 billion a year out of us poor taxpayers."

They don't take into consideration and probably don't know about the two or more billion dollars a year that are charged to the farmer that is spent for the benefit of the nonfarm population.

They don't know that the loans of the REA, Farmers Home Administration, and others are returned to the U.S. Treasury.

But, regardless of the motivation for the resentment, we must not ignore the fact that the political influence of the farmer is not what it used to be.

The urban Members of Congress, particularly in the House, have been increasing their strength and can now vote down the farmer Members whenever they wish to.

They have demonstrated this several times in recent years.

Far be it from me to say that the public resentment against farm programs is entirely unjustified.

We have worked ourselves into some ludicrous situations.

Take the case of wheat, for example.

Congress has stated that the minimum planting of wheat should be 55 million acres.

Yet, because millions of acres that used to produce 15 bushels to the acre are now producing 35 bushels to the acre, we have accumulated a surplus that is literally running out our ears.

Cotton land has been put into wheat. Hay land has been put into wheat. New land has been put into wheat.

The high-grade wheat-producing States have seen their production shift to low-grade wheat-producing areas, while the surplus owned by the Government has climbed to mountainous proportions.

It may be said that the tobacco grower is also finding himself being edged into a difficult situation.

I have been waiting for the producers themselves to come up with workable solutions to their problems.

They know the fix they are in and I hope they know how to get out of it.

Personally, I would not try to impose any specific plan on these commodity producers but would first await practical proposals from them.

I could not support proposals which would only result in making a bad situation worse.

Representatives of the cotton industry and the rice industry and the corn producers came before the Congress last summer with proposals of their own which were adopted.

There were only 11 votes in the Senate against their proposals.

If the wheat producers come before Congress with workable proposals to improve their position, I am sure they will get very sympathetic consideration, but any commodity group which proposes to improve its own position at the expense of others would probably not get very far.

Last summer, I worked very closely with Senator ELLENDER and other Senators of both parties on farm legislation.

I know we are going to work together during the coming session.

Farm legislation should not be partisan legislation and, so far as I am concerned, it will not be.

There is one particular aspect of the present agricultural revolution that concerns me very much.

That is the plight in which the small farmer finds himself.

You notice I don't say family farmer.

When farmwork was done mostly by hand or mule power, the family farmer was indeed a small farmer.

That is not true any longer.

Many farm families are now producing a hundred thousand dollars a year or more of commodities without outside help except of a seasonal nature.

But, as the agricultural evolution has gone on, as developments have progressed in the field of technology and biology, large numbers of farmers on small farms find themselves in a position of being unable to make even a modest living for their families.

Even if supported at 200 percent of parity they still could not make a decent living according to present standards.

The Federal Government has taken recognition of this fact and, through the rural development program, has been undertaking to find ways to deal with the situation.

It is obvious that we cannot gear price support programs to the needs of the most uneconomic producer.

If we did this, we would impose a terrific penalty either on the taxpayer or on the consumers of the country, without adequately improving the position of the small farmer.

To produce food and fiber at excessive costs and hold it for excessive prices destroys both domestic and foreign markets and, thereby, reacts directly against the people it is planned to benefit.

By all means, we should continue and step up our research programs aimed at increasing production per acre, lowering costs, improving methods of handling, processing, and utilization and the development of new uses for farm commodities especially for those which are chronically in surplus.

I would also favor increasing our efforts to solve the problem of the uneconomic farmer, encouraging the production of specialty crops, shifting to crops which do not require extensive capital outlay, improving the available land on the small farm, increasing the number of productive acres where possible, and developing part time off the farm employment.

I know we can make progress in this direction, because I happen to live in a county where this transition has already taken place.

My own neighbors are living better than they used to and the value of the taxable property has greatly increased.

To make the rural development program successful and to enable people who love the land to continue to live on the land and to adequately support their families, we have to look beyond the matter of crop production alone.

Better rural highways, continuation of rural electrification programs without increased costs, better education and health facilities, and all these things which go to make a better living have to be part of the rural development program.

We have to do those things which will make industries want to come into our communities and provide work for our people.

The more people we can keep on the land, owning a bit of the soil and taking pride in that ownership, the more secure our Nation and our democratic form of government will be.

Finally, let me say that one reason I am here in Memphis today taking part in this great plant-to-prosper conference is because you folks of the Southern States reconciled your varying viewpoints on cotton legislation until you had something to come to Congress with.

I know you will give united support to other programs such as the rural development program.

It was a satisfaction to work with you on the constructive proposals you made last summer, and so long as I am a Member of the U.S. Senate you will continue to have my cooperation.

McCormack Predicts Strong Program by Democratic Congress and Democratic Sweep in 1960

OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, House Majority Leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK, when interviewed by John Harris, of the Boston Globe, expressed complete confidence that the big Democratic majority in the 86th Congress will legislate a sound and progressive program. With this record, the party will go before the people from a stronger position than ever before. Actually, the wealth of available talent to choose from is unprecedented. Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, is the leading contender. In any case, the Democrats are sure to elect their standard bearer to the Presidency in 1960.

Mr. MCCORMACK, whose knowledge of major issues and keen sense of public opinion trends command respectful attention, believes that the people are with the Democrats all the way.

Summing up, the "field general" of the House Democrats said:

I look for an outstanding record, and look forward to 1960 to a complete Democratic victory, including the White House and Congress.

As the 1st session of the 86th Congress faces up to its responsibilities, I believe that we should read the views of our majority leader. Therefore, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD the following article from the January 4, 1959, issue of the Boston Sunday Globe:

DEMOCRATIC HOUSE LEADER MCCORMACK'S PREDICTIONS—WHAT NEXT 2 YEARS WILL BRING: NO SPLIT IN DEMOCRATIC PARTY; MRS. ROOSEVELT'S ROADBLOCK WON'T STOP KENNEDY; NIXON TO GET NOMINATION, LOSE ELECTION

(By John Harris)

The topheavy 2-to-1 majority the Democrats have won in the new Congress will not lead to unwieldiness, said Congressman JOHN W. MCCORMACK, but will mean Speaker RAYBURN and I will have a workable majority with no worry, as in the past, about coalitions between Republican and 25 to 40 Democrats, mostly from the South.

The veteran lawmaker, majority leader in the National House of Representatives, made these other highlight observations in the course of an interview on the incoming Congress, its relations with the White House and potential effect on the 1960 election:

"Of the presidential candidates, I think Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY is in the best position at the present time. The best evidence is that Mrs. Roosevelt's recent statement was an attempt to throw a roadblock in his way, but I do not think that was accomplished.

"The Berlin situation is very disturbing because of the geographical location of Berlin, isolated from the rest of the free world. But I do not conceive of the Kremlin being willing to go to general war over Berlin.

"The new Democrats elected to Congress are practically all of them progressive-minded. So the results of the last election were a good thing for the country, which is stronger and our people best served when progressive leadership is in control of the Government."

Does Congressman MCCORMACK feel that the Democratic Party will be split in 1960's national convention by the civil rights issues which have become prominent, tangles in the new Congress, with the Senate divided over the filibuster rule change, and the House confronted with the disputed seating of a segregationist from Little Roek?

"I don't expect," said MCCORMACK, "that there will be any severe difficulty or tension in the 1960 National Democratic Convention because there is a civil rights bill on the statute books.

"It is more difficult to create a split when there is a law on the statute books than when there is not. The civil rights bill was passed by the 85th Congress, a Democratically controlled Congress, the first time any such legislation passed in about 90 years.

"Even with the division in the Democratic Party on this question, a Democratic Congress did pass this historic bill. It is interesting to note that only 6 years ago we had a Republican Congress and President Eisenhower, a Republican, was in the White House, and the Republicans did not even report a civil rights bill out of committee in either House.

"This makes the achievement of the 85th Democratic Congress all the more significant.

"Having been chairman of the platform committee at three of the last four National Democratic Conventions, I think by hard experience I'm in a position to form an opinion on this matter.

"I do not look for any trouble—or party split—in the 1960 convention. There'll be some talk about third party and an impending split, but it will only be interesting reading in the newspapers.

"In my opinion there is no such danger. The Democratic Party will go into the 1960 election united."

With the increased progressive membership from the northern section of the Nation, and particularly from the West, what legislation does Congressman MCCORMACK foresee the new Congress will enact?

"There will be housing legislation, a depressed area bill, an increase in minimum wages anywhere up to $1.25 an hour, an acceleration of the interstate highway program, modernization of airports to make them safer for passengers in the coming jet age, further consideration of amendments to the Social Security Act such as increasing the amount that can be earned after retirement, and, if the recession grows worse, there will be legislation of an antirecession nature.

"The Democratic Party above all stands for strong national defense and a firm foreign policy. We must recognize that the Communist challenge of world revolution and domination is stronger than in the past and we must be as determined as ever. We can never permit ourselves to get in a position where we lose our retaliatory power."

Will the Democratically controlled Congress exceed the pared down $77 billion budget proposed by President Eisenhower?

"If we feel it is in the interest of national security we will do so as in the 85th Congress. Then the President wanted an Army of 870,000 and we appropriated for an Army of 900,000.

"He requested 175,000 marines; we appropriated for 200,000. The President was for reducing the Armed Forces.

"The Democratic Congress felt in the world today that was too great a risk to take. I still feel that way."

What can the Congress do about a stronger foreign policy?

"The important thing is that we do not have a shifting from day to day, week to week on foreign policy because that is a sign of weakness and uncertain leadership. The only thing the Congress can do is to mold public opinion. We've certainly done that in the past. We intend to do so in the future.

"Congress, under the Constitution, cannot make foreign policy. The President is the sole repository in the field of foreign policy as he is also Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. But Congress can criticize and propose, and the Democrat Congress will do this.

"Congress will also cooperate on a bipartisan basis with the President although there has been little evidence of real bipartisan action on the part of President Eisenhower because the Democratic leadership in Congress has not been consulted before policy is made.

"In the interest of the country, the President would be following a wise course if he consulted Democratic leadership before major decisions are made. This does not mean he has to accept our opinion, but on the other hand we might be able to make excellent contributions and it would have a marked effect on our people and the world, for the world, free and Communist, would know there is real unity."

What about cooperation between the White House and Capitol Hill, now that the Democrats rule the Congress by a 2-to-1 margin?

"No difficulty on real cooperation on the part of the Democrats, because we've been giving cooperation to President Eisenhower under painful conditions.

"The matter of real cooperation rests with President Eisenhower and the Republicans. The interest of the country is greater than any political party."

Looking forward to 1960, McCormack said:

"From the Democratic angle the issues of the 1960 election will be made by the 86th Democratically controlled Congress. It will be the basis for us going before the people. I look for an outstanding record, and look forward to 1960 to a complete Democratic victory, including the White House and Congress."

On the subject of presidential contenders:

"There are a number: Senator KENNEDY, Senator SYMINGTON, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator JOHNSON, Governor Williams, Governor Meyner, Gov. Pat Brown if he has the thought in mind, Adlai Stevenson, several others.

"The Democrats have a wide field of qualified candidates to pick from.

"The Republican Party is in the opposite position. In the first place they are badly split on basic questions. The old guard Republicans are groping out of the underground and they have great strength in their national convention.

"The Republicans have only Vice President NIXON and Governor Rockefeller.

"I do not think Vice President NIXON will make a strong candidate on the voter level. He has powerful opposition in his own party and has lost prestige with the people.

"He's trying to flirt with both progressives and standpatters. That's difficult to do, particularly on the presidential level.

"The progressive-minded people do not like his policies.

"On the other hand the standpatters do not like Rockefeller. There is a bad schism in the Republican Party right across the board. This does not exist in the Democratic Party. Furthermore, President Eisenhower's influence is waning, and his strength has been personal rather than political. He has shown inability to transmit his strength to other Republicans.

"In my opinion NIXON will get the nomination because he has practical control of the party machinery, and the Republicans have no one else to select.

"I think Rockefeller is too smart to be a candidate in 1960 with the political conditions existing then, and he'll wait for a later date."

Removal of Two-Term Limitation on Presidency

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, on January 15, I introduced a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to repeal the two-term limitation imposed upon the Presidency. The constitutional amendment which first enacted this limitation was never thoroughly considered. It was never a clearly thought out proposal, used for constructive purposes, but was, in my opinion, an emotional reaction against President Roosevelt, who had succeeded in winning four elections. It was enacted by the Republican 80th Congress with unbecoming haste.

Time has proven how sorry a mistake this amendment is. The country is living with a lameduck President who, in his second term, has lost much of the political power essential to him for leadership. It hampers, in my opinion, the treatymaking powers of the President, and is disadvantageous in the delicate day-to-day operations of our foreign affairs.

In short, with such limitation—namely, that his powers terminate on a day certain—the President loses effectiveness, both at home and abroad. Moreover, this limitation is to my mind an unjustifiable expression of distrust of the electorate.

I firmly believe that the repeal of this amendment is one of the musts of the 86th Congress.

OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement which I have prepared entitled "More Funds for Great Lakes Connecting Channels."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE FUNDS FOR GREAT LAKES CONNECTING CHANNELS

In reviewing the 1960 budget submitted to Congress yesterday, I am deeply disappointed by the inadequate funds recommended for a particular program—the deepening and development work on the Great Lakes connecting channels.

The $23 million proposed for this work is, I am informed, absolutely inadequate—if we are to put the target date of 1962 for completion of the work on the connecting channels.

As we recognize, the Great Lakes States beyond Lake Erie will be denied the benefit of the completed seaway until the connecting channels are deepened to handle 27-foot, deep-draft shipping to and from the lakes region.

OPENING OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY IN APRIL

As we know, the St. Lawrence Seaway itself is scheduled for opening in April of this year.

The event will mark a milestone of progress in this great joint United States-Canadian project that will open the door of the Great Lakes to deep-sea trade and commerce of the world. Until now, the seaway commerce into the St. Lawrence has, unhappily, been restricted because of limited depth—prohibiting the passing of deep-draft vessels through its channels.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence area includes many of our States of the upper Midwest, and the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec in Canada. Within this area live one-third of the people of both countries.

In this Great Lakes region, too, is concentrated the greatest industrial-agricultural complex in the world. To unwisely postpone benefits of the seaway to the major portion of this region, I believe, would be detrimental to both United States and Canadian interests.

Subsequently I shall make recommendations for additional moneys, in accordance with the amount the Corps of Engineers can effectively put to work, to try to assure completion of the connecting channels by the target date of 1962.

In the days ahead, also, the Congress will be faced with a number of additional important decisions on the seaway.

SEAWAY FILM

Incidentally, I am aware that a great many Members have not had the opportunity to benefit from an on-the-spot look as the St. Lawrence development project—one of the greatest engineering and construction feats in history.

To provide an idea of the scope, magnitude, and potential of this great project, I have arranged for a film to be shown in the Old Supreme Court this afternoon.

The film, produced by the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, is the fourth in a series of many entitled "The Fourth Seacoast," portraying the most recent development in the seaway.

The film, a 14-minute, color movie, will be shown between 2 p.m. and 3 p.m. this afternoon. As necesary, it will be rerun during that period to assure interested individuals a chance to see it.

Although I know that Senators will be extremely busy, I cordially invite you to drop in to see the film, if it is at all possible.

The Import Difficulties of the Automobile Industry

OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Congress, I included in my remarks the text of an address made by Mr. Roger M. Blough, the board chairman of the United States Steel Corp. Mr. Blough called attention in his speech to the increasing flood of imports of steel and steel products and their resulting adverse effect on the American steel industry and our domestic economy.

Mr. Blough did not believe that reasonable tariffs to equalize foreign and domestic costs were the solution to the steel industry's problem. Rather, he felt that restraint with respect to wages could offer a solution. I pointed out at the time that, while I agreed with his statement of the problem, I did not agree with his solution.

Now another leading industrialist, Mr. Ernest R. Breech, chairman of the board of the Ford Motor Co., has cited the problems facing the American automobile industry as a result of the economic resurgence of Europe.

Mr. Breech and the other automobile manufacturers have good reason to be disturbed about the flood of imports and the failure of other nations to reciprocate our Government's generosity with respect to admitting imports. Yet, in part, policies which he espouses have caused this situation.

For the year ending October 31, 1958, the United States imported 398,791 automobiles. Over the same period we exported 130,723. From the viewpoint of the shareholders and workers in the automotive industry, such a 3-to-1 adverse ratio can scarcely be interpreted to mean that the foreign trade policies of the United States were written and are being administered with their welfare in mind.

And the situation would appear to be deteriorating rather than improving, in view of the fact that our automobile exports for the first 10 months of 1958 were down 10 percent from the same period of 1957; and our imports were up almost 100 percent.

While I am not an expert in the affairs of the automobile industry, one has only to do some simple arithmetic to compute the effect of this situation upon our workers. Some 600,000 people on the average were employed in the industry in 1958; production was 5,119,720 units. Thus, it might be said that roughly each worker produced about 8.5 automobiles during the year. Employment figures for the automotive industry show substantial month-by-month variations. The 600,000 figure is believed to be a relatively conservative one, rendering the results discussed elsewhere also on the low side.

Hence, we see that the 398,791 automobiles imported displaced some 44,300 jobs in the automobile industry.

On the other hand, and for the latest available 12 months' period, the exports of 130,723 vehicles provided jobs to some 15,400 workers.

The next time the free-trade advocates from Detroit express concern over unemployment in that area, they might well give some thought to the fact that the difference between the jobs displaced and the jobs created showed a net deficit of 28,900 jobs. That conservative estimate is no insubstantial number of unemployed American citizens, the vast majority of them in Michigan.

Now, in its monumental study, "The United States in World Trade," the American Tariff League makes the following statement:

> It can be estimated that for every 100 jobs permanently lost, a community is deprived of $360,000 in annual retail sales; $270,000 in bank deposits; 107 automobile registrations; 112 households; 74 jobs in other enterprises; 4 retail establishments.
> In addition to this approximate equation, other significant cutbacks must be computed, such as reduced Federal, State and local tax revenues; greater outlays for unemployment compensation; declining school budgets; less income for charitable purposes.

If these 28,900 jobs are permanently lost in the automotive industry, we can then apply the league's ratio of 74 additional jobs lost to each 100 manufacturing jobs lost, and we have 21,200 more unemployed, or a grand total of 50,100 jobs lost—again mostly in Michigan.

Let us assume that the annual wages of each of the 50,100 workers would have been $4,000 a year, a conservative figure. Again by simple arithmetic, we find that the imports were costing American workers $200,400,000 in wages lost over the 12 months named—again mostly in Michigan.

I would now like to call my colleagues' attention to the conclusions of Mr. Breech. While I would agree with him that the problem is serious and that American automobile manufacturing suffers from a serious cost disadvantage, I differ markedly from some of his conclusions. As one of his conclusions, he states:

> If America's cost disadvantage continues to increase, however, it seems to me that we must anticipate an increasing flight of American capital and much more sourcing of parts and products abroad. A trend in this direction is already evident. American manufacturers of tractors and farm implements, as well as typewriters, office machines, cameras, and optical instruments—particularly goods having a high labor content—are increasingly sourcing and manufacturing in Europe, Latin America, and Japan for sale in the American market. I suggest that what is now a trickle may grow to a flood which could disrupt both production and employment patterns here in the United States.

I disagree with him that this transplantation abroad of American capital and, more importantly, American jobs is now only a trickle. It already is disrupting both production and employment patterns here in the United States. Already substantial, it will inevitably continue to grow under the foreign trade policies our Government has practiced for the past 25 years. I agree with him that any such deteriorative situation is unfortunate.

His next conclusion deals with the same point:

> Now it seems to me that, if we want to sell in expanding world markets, and more importantly if we do not want to see American production and jobs disrupted by the flight of capital and industry abroad, we are going to have to remain competitive in design, quality, costs, and prices with foreign industry.

By all means we must remain competitive in design and quality. However, with the labor differential so substantial between our workers and those abroad, we cannot now compete with respect to costs and prices; nor will we be able to do so in the foreseeable future. This problem is not unique to the automobile industry; it is true of hundreds of other American industries.

Mr. Breech rejects the use of reasonable tariffs to make our prices and costs competitive with those of foreign industry.

I do not agree.

Reasonable tariffs offer us at least a partial method of insulating our American standard of living against the ravages of cut-rate, foreign competition. And yet, as every Member of this House must know, I have never advocated the use of the tariff simply as a mechanism to exclude foreign goods from our markets. Rather, I have long advocated the principle of fair and open competition between American manufacturers and their counterparts overseas; and one way to insure this kind of competition is to use reasonable tariffs as an equalizing device.

If our automotive industry is to reduce its costs and prices as he suggests, all I can suggest is that they had better hurry up.

Mr. Breech also considers the lack of reciprocity abroad to be a major problem and I agree with much of what he says on this:

> Here I want to point out that, whatever our own problems of cost reduction, we must be granted full and free competitive access to foreign markets.
> The theory that trade is a two-way street applies just as much to our foreign competitors as it does to us. If we are to give free access to the American market to foreign producers with size and efficiency comparable to ours and with substantially lower wage costs, we must ask an equally fair crack at their markets.

Here I would point out that in 1957, Great Britain allowed only 265 American automobiles to be imported, and a scant 576 found their way to West Germany. This does not seem to me to be reciprocal trade. In 1957, the United States exported 142,000 cars, while West German auto exports exceeded 500,000 and Great Britain shipped 426,000. Both countries, of course, did much better in 1958.

For 25 years, the State Department has been, in effect, telling us that, if we provided a good example by lowering our tariffs, other countries would reciprocate. I believe that Mr. Breech's own remarks show how unsuccessful that policy has been:

> Today, some European countries have tariff and quota barriers so effective, or penalties so high, as virtually to exclude all imports of various U.S. manufactured goods. Take the case of automobiles.
> As you may know, our tariff on imported cars was recently lowered from 10 percent to 8½ percent. We have no quotas or other restrictive devices such as currency controls.
> Now consider a 1959 Ford Fairlane 500 Fordor Hardtop, with full optional equipment, delivered in Pittsburgh. The suggested list price is about $3,600, including State and Federal taxes, although, as in the case of many other products, it is common knowledge that the actual cost to the customer may be somewhat lower than the manufacturer's suggested retail price. If you wanted to buy the same car in France, England, or Italy, you would have to hurdle barriers of severe quota restrictions and heavy cost penalties.
> In France, the delivered price of that car is about $8,200. It includes no less than $3,200 of duties, a 40 percent premium for dollars called an equalization fee, and special purchase taxes. You would also pay an annual use tax of about $240. In Italy, it would cost $5,800, with a penalty of $1,400, plus an annual use tax as high as $302.50. In England, the price would be about $8,000, with the penalty composed of a 30 percent duty and a 60 percent purchase tax—which is applied without discrimination, however, to all passenger vehicles.
> As if these formidable barriers were not enough, imports are further limited by severe quotas and related devices. France admits only 12,000 vehicles a year from all sources, the United Kingdom presently restricts imports from the United States and Canada to 650 automobiles per year—even that quota has not been filled every year—and Italy admits only a few hundred American cars.

I have many times commented on this lack of reciprocity which Mr. Breech so clearly documents in his address. For 25 years I have been listening to the State Department promise that the condition would be corrected.

Imports are not the only problem which has faced or now faces American industry. Obviously there are others, such as styling changes, consumer tastes, management-union controversy, and a host of like problems. But I would state, as anybody who goes out to a nearby traffic light can see for himself, that imported automobiles are one of them—and an extremely serious one at that.

I am concerned about the small shareholder who has invested his hard-earned savings in the automobile industry. I am concerned with the men and women who have lost their jobs. I am concerned with the young people who are unemployed because of diminishing job opportunities.

The major segments of the automobile industry have for some years preached the doctrine of ever-freer trade. Leaders of the United Auto Workers have also preached this doctrine. I should think that their shareholders and union members would today be wondering about the wisdom of such policies.

I might, therefore, respectfully urge that those business and union statesmen, who have been preaching freer trade, might wish to reevaluate their own policies.

I deeply regret I can foresee no immediate improvement in the situation.

Comprehensive Conflict of Interest Bill and Government Ethics Code

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, on January 15 I introduced two bills in Congress to strengthen the Federal conflict-of-interest laws and to enact a comprehensive code of Government employment ethics.

Testimony taken before the Antitrust Subcommittee and before other congressional bodies has revealed that a thorough revision of the Federal laws prohibiting conflicts of interest in Government employment is long overdue. Existing laws are confused and inadequate. They contain pitfalls for the unwary and loopholes for the unscrupulous.

To correct this situation, one of the bills I am introducing today revises, simplifies, and coordinates the conflict of interest statutes and the related prohibitions against bribery. The measure should assure the Federal Government of the maximum protection against unethical practices, without unduly impairing the attractiveness of the Government service to competent persons.

Principal provisions of this bill include the following:

First. Lifetime prohibition of breaches of confidence in matters formerly worked on by employees who leave the Government.

Second. Prohibition of payments to—as well as receipts by—Government officials of compensation for services rendered before Federal agencies.

Third. Uniformity of provisions prohibiting bribery of officials, and extension of bribery provisions to witnesses before committees of Congress and before Federal agencies.

Fourth. Cancellation of Government contracts, licenses and grants consummated in violation of the conflict of interest and bribery laws.

The other bill that I will introduce would enact an overall code of ethical conduct to cover employees of all Government agencies, as well as all former employees, and members of the public dealing with the agencies. Unlike existing law, this bill would provide administrative penalties, including, first, discharge, for employees who engage in unethical conduct; second, suspension or disbarment of representatives who violate rules governing the activities of former Federal employees; and third, disqualification for contracts and grants of private parties who engage in unethical practices in dealing with the Government.

Address by Jose A. Benitez at the Democratic Victory Dinner at San Juan, P.R.

OF
HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech which was made at a Democratic dinner in San Juan, P.R., by Mr. Jose A. Benitez, who is the chairman of the Democratic Party of Puerto Rico. On December 15, I had the privilege of speaking before the victory dinner of Puerto Rico's vigorous Democratic Party. Mr. Benitez, who is one of Puerto Rico's outstanding young leaders, is the author of "Puerto Rico and the Political Destiny of America," and his speech conveys the talent and imagination which characterize public affairs in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY JOSE A. BENITEZ, CHAIRMAN, DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF PUERTO RICO, AT THE GREAT DEMOCRATIC VICTORY DINNER HONORING SENATOR JOHN KENNEDY, DECEMBER 15, 1958, AT THE SAN JUAN INTERCONTINENTAL HOTEL, SAN JUAN, P.R.

Mrs. Kennedy, Senator KENNEDY, and distinguished guests, thanks to all of you present and all of you listening on the radio, for the great cooperation to the Democratic Party and to me in the organizing of this great Democratic victory dinner. We are Democrats; the Puerto Ricans are born Democrats, because we unquestionably believe in the principle of our great organization, the party of the people, for the people, and by the people.

Senator KENNEDY, Puerto Rico welcomes you. You represent our ideals of a democratic way of life to which we as a community are devoted. Puerto Rico stands out in the world as one of the most progressive places. We do not know of racial discrimination, of religious intolerance, or of social and economic oligarchy (óligarqui). Our people recognize that this progress has been achieved to a large extent to the clear understanding of our philosophy by the leaders of our great Nation, like Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Harry Truman, and those in the U.S. Senate like Senator KENNEDY, who always have given us their effective support to the solution of our political, social, and economic problems.

The leadership of our Governor, Luis Muñoz Marín, has guided our people through the path of unprecedented achievements which have brought noticeable welfare and happiness to Puerto Rico, and prestige and respect to our great Nation throughout the world.

We have achieved only part of our goals. We are a young and struggling society ready to go beyond our geographical limits imposed by the great oceans, to work on behalf of effective democracy in our hemisphere. For example, we are not completely satisfied because we do not have the internal threat of communism in Puerto Rico. We will be satisfied when we can say that the Communist threat is completely wiped out in all Latin America. The young and strong faces you have seen in Puerto Rico, and you see here tonight, is the best example of the decision of our new generations to actively participate in all phases of our democratic life. We do not want to lose time going back on what we have accomplished. This is past. We are anxious to devote our energies and intelligence to the job we have ahead.

In view of the forbidding political situation overshadowing the shrinking world in which we live, it is to be hoped that the great international leaders of the free world will come to recognize the necessity of strengthening and securing the life of their people, uniting them in commonwealths of maximum potentialities. The differences between nations having great territories and large populations together with powerful economic resources, and the nations possessed of small territory, small population, and scanty resources can be adjusted only by the unification of peoples with the same ideals, interests, and common ambitions, unification directed toward the end of becoming greater through such understanding.

In a world such as ours, full of driving and competitive tendencies, with some nations engaged in the barbaric domination that enslaves weaker ones, our chief problem is no other than that of assuring our survival by making ourselves the fittest, through mutual defense and cooperation with the other nations in our hemisphere.

From the early days of tribal life to the present, humanity has moved always toward greater community concentrations. This beneficial tendency has proceeded, however, at a slow pace, a gait that has dragged heavily on the potential advancement of civilization.

It is a shameful fact, and the fault of world leaders, that scientific progress has had its greatest and most rapid advancement in the forced culture of wartime. But such is a fact. Nations that could develop with more splendor and nobility in time of peace, have been very busy consuming the acid fruits of their selfishness, giving little consideration to the magnificent possibilities for their own enlargement through the fraternal growth of humanity.

The evolution toward a unique government of the human race—which is inevitable in the centuries to come—would have no civilized virtue if it were to come into being through the domination of men by man. However, the present leader in the movement toward the gathering of peoples is a piratical colossus. He is indeed swiftly forming mighty conglomerates, both in population and in geographical expanse. And that being the case, prudence dictates that we face the inevitable conclusions and not delay a moment the labor that must be committed for our progress toward the conquest and the fulfillment of our future.

Our hemisphere cannot ignore the realities of life at the crossroads where its nations stand today. The countries of the two Americas should earnestly and deeply meditate the historical implications of the moment in which they are immersed; their weakness in their present isolation in the stormy international currents; the greatness which they could achieve in a hemispheric bloc, and the energy which could be generated in social, economic, scientific, and cultural interchanges among the American nations. In a word, it is necessary to rationalize and to see the mission which a united America, pioneering and unselfish, could accomplish for the peaceful and fruitful organization of the genuinely civilized world of the future.

The incalculable natural wealth that the enormous territory of the American continents holds—still largely neglected, or unsuspected, in the soil—once developed to capacity could supply all the needs of the world.

The American nations occupy a comparatively virgin land. They are not subject to the grievous pressures for existence that bear upon communities of the Old World, where feelings of discouragement, despair and desperation have driven the people often to the road of war as a means of escape.

Our hemisphere must turn its eyes to its fitting and unexplored greatness, developing and directing it, and offering its fruits generously to the nations that now fight for a place under the sun. The contribution of America thus offered loyally for human fellowship could and should reestablish the equilibrium of those tormented nations whose constriction has induced them to make war and thus to retard the advancement of civilization.

The Americas could and should provide the rest of humanity the additional resources needed for its happiness, abandoning all reserve and hostility. Because of its youth, our hemisphere has all the conditions, qualities, riches, and strength needed for the task of fraternally reconstructing the world to a degree which up to now has been spoken of only in a theoretical way. Its healthy youth, its unselfish and graceful spirit, place the Americas in the privileged historic position to be the human bloc that will find ways of removing disputes and problems of the world through brotherly devices, doing away with the dark barbarity of violence.

The United States evidently is the most highly developed and efficient power in the American sphere. Its strength not only could establish its leadership from Alaska to Patagonia but also could extend it to the most distant corners of the world. As the chief defense against the antagonistic attitude shown by Russia to the nations of the Occident, dominated as Russia is by an imperialistic greed for expansion and world control, the United States is under an obligation to protect the right of liberty and the useful life, and to continue in this role, maintaining through various alliances the means to safeguard conservative and altruistic ideals. These alliances must be effected even with nations which are in many respects quite different in their character and interests, to the end that there will be a universal human fraternity and the development of a common civilization which will endure forever. But she should give first thought to the protection, security, and survival of the occidental nations that have a mutual area of interests. In this time of continuous threats to world freedom, the United States has no alternative; it must put all its resources at the service of the defense of all friendly nations whose fortunes are tied to its own security.

Her responsibility and concern regarding affairs more distant certainly does not mean that the United States should not give first attention to the historic mission close at hand, that of establishing a fraternal union with the Latin American nations of the hemisphere. It is to be hoped that the leaders of our great Republic to the north will consider giving urgent precedence to work for an understanding with their Nation's neighbors in Latin America, so as to begin the germination of hemispheric unity as a starting point toward the greater, worldwide work which destiny seems to have reserved for our hemisphere.

On the other side, I feel sure that the leaders of the Latin American countries will do no less in the vital appointments than they have with history.

All the leaders must stubbornly strive to give creative objectivity to the mission which is theirs to fulfill in their respective communities, to build the new world that is to come. The United States and Latin America could provide preponderantly the techniques and resources and, above all, the virtues of brotherly unselfishness which would be required for the achievement of the great task.

It is unnecessary, perhaps, to point out that the peoples of all the Americas are equally obligated not to shrink from the massive demands of the glorious gesture that the desperate, cornered state of humanity calls for.

The task is there. It is for its missionaries to carry it through to victory.

In the course of the historic mission that the American nations could jointly fulfill to obtain the world fellowship that I am advocating here, an immediate benefit to all the nations of the hemisphere would be a rapport established with each other, erasing the frictions and prejudices that grew up in the creation of the intercontinental society. In a great measure, these prejudices and frictions are ghosts of doubts and suspicions begotten by the distrust and lack of communication which has predisposed the various races. In a lesser way—also ghosts, because they belong to errors of the past—the prejudices of Latin America are the result of the intervention by the United States on Latin American soil, prior to the time when President Franklin D. Roosevelt established a policy of hemispheric friendship.

As the two continents were drawn to each other in a cordial and loyal approach, they would remove frontiers that today separate North, Central, and South America, not geographically and politically, but with regard to interests and abstractions that are equally formidable.

Such an approach, based on fraternity and cooperation, would relieve the United States of an outside search for that which she needs to prosper and to enlarge herself and would similarly put within easy reach of Latin America all the productive resources that are lacking within its geographical limits. The two would contribute their respective potentialities—those already developed and the much more copious ones which are yet undeveloped—so that in a few years the resulting social, economic, scientific and cultural advancement would be enormous.

Puerto Rico is by origin Latin American. It entered into political relations with the United States in 1898. The island suffered from the same problems of misunderstanding and remoteness that exist today between the United States and other Latin American communities. Puerto Ricans faced incomprehension and indifference. There could be no success for us that was not based on the greatness of both the people of the mainland and the people of Puerto Rico. As soon as we began to draw together, all incomprehensions and prejudices fell apart, and our association, fortified today by the bond of citizenship, growth in the rich interchange on which our development is based.

If our Puerto Rican leaders succeeded in helping accomplish this American union, why could not the leaders who today orient the policies of other Latin American communities broaden and advance such diplomatic gains?

Communist Russia knows that its cunning expansionism cannot undermine, even in a clandestine way, the compact and powerful unity of the North American people. That is why it is maneuvering desperately to infiltrate its germs of anarchism, weakness, and demoralization in the vital organs of the Latin American countries, through seemingly advantageous economic offers that doubtless could endanger the stability and free determination of those communities. Can we be so deceived as to yield to an economic infiltration over which hovers the steel expansionism and the grasping domination that have enslaved so many satellites in Russia's barbarous orbit?

Nothing that Latin America and the United States could wish for to improve their respective communities needs to be searched for in the Old World. They have everything needful in their own territory, or if anything is lacking temporarily it can be found by exploration of hemispheric resources. The continents—under the infinite guidance of God—must hope that the leaders of the several nations may have the vision of their enormous destiny.

The North and the South must end their disagreement and each one get rid of the limitations that hinder this settlement. And instead of addressing each other in stilted diplomatic language they should start to speak the vernacular of the family.

The hemisphere may hope that the United States and Latin America will gracefully accomplish the part which is required of each one. The destiny of both is the political destiny of all America.

God will order affairs so that the lesson of Puerto Rico will guide the achievement of the task that the American nations can fulfill for the progress of human relations.

Puerto Rico broke down the barriers of misunderstanding with the United States, and has thus developed, under the cordial influence of the resulting rapprochement, its multiple and vigorous potentialities.

This privileged position enables the Puerto Rican people, intellectually, politically, and psychologically, to serve as a responsible spokesman to the United States concerning the values which the Latin American people could contribute on behalf of the general good of this great hemisphere of ours.

The world more and more is tending to lose its nationalistic barriers. It will be ripe, in the course of time, to accept the idea of a single governmental organization administered on the concept that there is only one humanity. The leaders of the great geographic communities—as the Europeans, the Asiatics, and the Arabians have begun to do—are under the obligation of grouping and strengthening their energies, to spread the greatness that dissolves selfishness, shares potentialities, ennobles life, and perfect civilization.

Puerto Rico wishes to sow its humble portion of seed in a furrow of the planting of brotherhood that will bring forth the mighty unified America that is on its way.

Senator KENNEDY. The new generations of Latin America and right here in Puerto Rico are eagerly looking forward to a new and effective foreign policy by the United States of America, based on the philosophy that we are more than good neighbors; that in our world of today we are fraternal brothers. These new generations are anxiously waiting for men like you to implement with the help of Almighty God an effective "good brother policy."

Address by Hon. Spessard L. Holland, of Florida, Before the 40th Annual Meeting, American Farm Bureau Federation, Boston, Mass.

OF
HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on December 10, 1958, the distinguished senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] delivered a thought-provoking and challenging address at the 40th annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Boston, Mass.

In order that Senators may have an opportunity to read this address, which calls attention to some of the most vital issues of our time, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TREND AND A CHALLENGE

(Address of SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, U.S. Senator from Florida, Democrat, before the American Farm Bureau Federation's 40th annual meeting, December 10, 1958, Boston, Mass.)

I am happy to be one of your speakers at this 40th annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and to join such distinguished guests as Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, my able colleague, Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, of Arizona, and your former president, Allan Kline. I had the pleasure of addressing you at your 36th annual meeting in New York City and I am indeed glad to be with you again today.

May I express to you, and through you to all members of the American Farm Bureau Federation, my deep appreciation for your naming me to receive the American Farm Bureau distinguished service award in 1956 at Miami. This award brought to me very great pleasure and pride, and I am humbly grateful for all it signifies.

My association with your splendid organization has brought me many pleasant and helpful experiences. I have frequently sought and obtained valuable assistance from the members of your exceedingly capable Washington staff, and have always enjoyed the full cooperation of the officers and members of our Florida Farm Bureau.

I have found your thinking on agricultural legislation—and indeed on national affairs generally—in close accord with mine, in most instances, and when we have not been in complete agreement you have always been courteous and tolerant of my convictions. In my opinion, your State organization in Florida, and your national organization always approach constructively and patriotically the many difficult problems in the field of agriculture, and I congratulate you warmly for your sound leadership and your major contributions in this vital field.

I am glad to have this opportunity to talk to you this morning about a trend in our country which disturbs me greatly and which, if permitted to go unchecked, may well lead to the destruction of our American way of life—the finest yet conceived by man.

The trend I speak of is that which is now moving away from individual freedom and initiative toward an ever enlarged Federal Government and a labor supergovernment—at the expense of the rights and privileges of States, local governments, and individuals. Unfortunately, many of our people cannot understand that they themselves are the Federal Government, that they pay all of its bills, and that they the people get nothing free from their Government. They do not realize that by looking to that Government for handouts—each of which costs them certain rights and privileges—they lose each time a little more of their freedom, and that little by little they are giving away their heritage. Even as small children we heard with amazement the Bible story of a hungry Esau who carelessly sold his birthright for a mere bowl of pottage, but now—as mature men and women—some of us are willing to actually give away our heritage—since we not only pay for the small bowl of pottage we receive in return for certain of our freedoms but we also pay extra for handling charges.

Having worked closely with your officials throughout the years, I know that they and you are well aware of this dangerous trend. I know that the American Farm Bureau is moving in many ways to try to reverse that trend, but I hope that all of you, as individuals and as members of this powerful organization, will leave this meeting today determined to personally wage an unremitting fight against a situation which, if it is permitted to continue, will gradually—but surely—take away from us many of the precious liberties for which much blood was shed by our forefathers. Perhaps some of you will feel that I am unduly disturbed over this drift away from our constitutional form of government. I hope that my remarks will convince you that the situation is serious—almost perilous—and that it presents a personal challenge to every man and woman within the sound of my voice.

For a first point in this connection I mention the stand of the American Farm Bureau in the last Congress on legislation designed to curb the Federal courts by prohibiting the invalidation of State laws by Federal laws—under the doctrine of preemption—unless Congress has clearly so provided or unless an irreconcilable conflict exists between the Federal law in question and the State laws. I commend you strongly for this action, and I hope we will enact such legislation early in the next Congress. Certainly I will do my utmost toward that end.

Recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States adversely affecting States rights have caused alarm and consternation in the minds of many of us who respect and wish to preserve both a Federal union of sovereign States and the clear separation of powers among the legislative, the judicial, and the executive branches of government.

It was heartening to note that on August 20 of this year, at a meeting of the conference of chief justices of the State courts, the alarming trend of these Supreme Court decisions was condemned by chief justices from the North, South, East, and West. The chairman of the committee that submitted the report was the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Michigan. I am happy that distinguished lawyers all over our Nation—particularly those holding positions of highest judicial responsibility—find it no longer possible to keep silent in the face of these constant invasions of the rights of the States and of our legislative branch of government. I am glad that most of the chief justices of our State courts share my belief—and your belief—that State and local governments should be sustained and strengthened.

The overall impact of U.S. Supreme Court decisions during the past two decades has been to press rapidly the extension of Federal power at the expense of our citizens' rights to govern themselves through their State and local governments in matters of primarily local concern. In my opinion, the Supreme Court has wrongly assumed the function of policymaker and has arrogated to itself the important legislative function. Under our Constitution the function of making policy is delegated to Congress, to elected representatives of the people who are directly responsible to the people. It is for this fundamental reason that all of us must feel concern that members of the Supreme Court, who hold office for life and are responsible only to themselves, have abandoned the role of judges and assumed the role of lawmakers.

The power of the Supreme Court is very great, and its decisions are not reviewable by anyone. It is, therefore, of critical importance to every American that this Court adhere strictly to the judicial role and abide by those enduring principles which are enshrined in our Constitution.

We have long boasted that in our free country we have a government of laws and not of men. Let me state here, along with most of the chief justices of our States, that a study of recent Supreme Court decisions will raise grave doubt as to the present truth of that proud boast.

No one expects a dynamic country like ours to stand still. Moreover, we expect our body of law to grow in meeting new and changing conditions. But under our Constitution it is not the duty of the men sitting on the Supreme Court to write into our law their passing notions about sociology and economics and education. Nor do they have the right to nullify and destroy the powers of our sovereign States and of our local units of self-government.

In my opinion, the recent strong pronouncement of the State chief justices is an important first step in reversing the trend which is rapidly destroying State and local governments and the fundamental principle of separation of powers. They have accepted the challenge and I am sure their courage and convictions will encourage others to face up to the serious realities of the situation. Now such organizations as this one must join in an active effort to enlighten the general public as to the seriousness of this problem. I am convinced that, when informed, the public will see to it that we return to our constitutional form of government.

A second element in the national trend away from basic freedoms—and a real challenge which must be met by organizations such as this and the rank and file of labor, is that disclosed in recent months by the McClellan committee which has pointed up so that everyone could see—and no one could seriously deny—the appalling corruption, crime, and violence which exists in the high circles of some labor unions. Gang bosses, goon squads, bribery, and embezzlement have no more place among unions than they have among our other American institutions. Our working people themselves are the ones who are most hurt by immoral and dishonest union leadership in those unions where it exists.

Perhaps some of you saw a few weeks ago a statement by Jimmy Hoffa, the head of the giant Teamsters Union—which has been one of the main targets of the McClellan committee—predicting that he would lead a mighty Teamster Union of 4½ million members spanning virtually the entire transportation industry, and then added, with characteristic brashness, "We will not be stopped by the McClellan committee, laws, or the courts".

After listening to dozens and dozens of witnesses one of the members of the McClellan committee, Senator ERVIN, of North Carolina, stated a few days ago that "This superlaw which the Teamsters attempt to interpose over the Government of the United States and the arrogant implementation of their activities is something which continues to concern this committee and I believe the entire country."

This situation certainly should cause great concern to all Americans and to the agricultural producers in particular, because the trucking industry performs a vital and necessary service in getting a large part of your produce to the marketplace. As a matter of fact, trucking has become so highly important in the transportation of food that the Nation's total trucking bill for the shipment of food now exceeds that paid for rail shipments. An extended tieup of this industry at harvesttime could wreck entire segments of agriculture and bankrupt thousands upon thousands of farmers—as well as handlers and processors of farm products—throughout the Nation.

In the next session of Congress, I expect to join again with other like-minded Senators and Representatives in support of legislation to prevent the domination and exploitation of rank-and-file union members by irresponsible and greedy labor bosses. Only in this way can the workingman know that his dues will be properly spent and that he will have the traditional rights that should be accorded to American labor. Only in this way can the farmer have reasonable assurance that his products will get to market, and the millions of inhabitants of our great metropolitan areas be sure that their food needs will be supplied.

One would naturally hope that the rank and file of labor would take the lead in this fight which is of such great importance to them, but since the actual livelihood of these men can be cut off in the twinkling of an eye by the labor bosses—and human nature being what it is—the major brunt of this effort may have to fall upon shoulders such as yours and the shoulders of the general public. If this proves to be the case, I am confident that you and the millions like you in America today will meet the test. Although this is in the field of labor, it is primarily a fight for freedom—and if the fight is lost our very way of life may be lost with it. This is indeed a serious challenge which requires the attention of every American.

A third battle in which you have been engaged and in which I hope you will continue to interest yourselves, and one which illustrates possibly clearer than any other the objectives of those who continually press for an ever larger and more powerful Federal Government, is the constant effort to increase the coverage of the Federal wage-and-hour law, which already applies to approximately 24 million workers in interstate commerce.

In the last Congress bills were introduced to extend coverage of the law to activities affecting commerce which would bring under the law even the corner drugstore with one employee. Even a cursory reading of the Constitution and the debates on this act when it was first enacted will show beyond the slightest doubt that this spread of control over local mercantile and service organizations was never intended nor deemed constitutionally possible by the New Deal sponsors of the act—President Franklin Roosevelt and Senator Hugo Black—now a member of the Supreme Court.

One of these bills of the last Congress would have extended coverage to almost 10 million additional workers, including roughly 1½ million agricultural workers. The bill finally reported by the Senate Labor Committee would have added 6 million employees, and did not include the agricultural workers. Obviously those who push the measure prefer to follow a course of divide and conquer.

Fortunately, these measures were not passed, but the efforts which I have mentioned indicate so clearly the ultimate goal of their sponsors—to finally bring every employee and every business in the Nation within the scope of these laws by regulating local wages and local hours of employment.

We have defeated these efforts before, but those who keep pressing this issue are continually working to sell their phidosophy, and unless the millions of citizens who oppose this paternalistic trend join in opposition to this drive to further encroach upon our freedoms, the day will surely come when we will not be able to stem the tide.

This effort illustrates clearly the lengths to which some eager so-called ultraliberals will go, regardless of constitutional limitations, to force the Federal Government to take over the control of the everyday local activities of our people.

Of course, we are always hearing stories with reference to the relationship between agriculture and labor, and I heard one recently which may bear repeating.

A farmer in Virginia was plowing one day when his tractor turned over on him, badly injuring him. He was immediately rushed to an overcrowded hospital in the Washington area but because of the lack of a bed in the proper ward, hospital officials were forced to place his bed in the hall in the maternity wing. The farmer was in a great deal of pain and was anxiously hoping for relief. To his great delight he heard two new mothers talking about a new practice which resulted in no pain at all. This they call twilight sleep.

A few minutes later a doctor came down the hall and the suffering farmer caught him by the sleeve and said, "Doctor, I am in horrible pain. Can't I get some of that twilight sleep?" The doctor said, "Well, sir, that is used only for labor." In all his pain the farmer came back angrily, "That's the trouble with the world today—everything for labor and not a single thing for us poor suffering farmers."

I have mentioned only three of the major problems, not solely in the field of agriculture, which mark the present dangerous trend in other fields, but which are just as important to the members of this organization as are strictly agricultural problems. But I am sure that you know that the next Congress must continue to face serious problems directly in the field of agriculture, made more serious by the trend which I have mentioned, as well as by the changed makeup of the new Congress, which will contain more so-called liberals than has been the case in many years. Incidentally, the other day I heard a present-day liberal defined as one who has his feet firmly planted in the air.

Some of you may recall that several years ago in a Senate speech I brought to the attention of the Senators and the American people the seriousness of the situation then existing in some of the agricultural areas of our country where farmers were openly advocating complete dependence on the Federal Government. I said at that time that I did not want to cast any reflections on sections of our country or on organizations or individuals, but I was alarmed and felt it my duty to call attention to what I had observed.

The information upon which I based my comments was gained through my personal participation in hearings held by the Senate Agriculture Committee in many of our States, particularly in the great Northwest. I was astounded to hear witness after witness come before our committee and plead for Government support prices at 100 percent of parity on every agricultural product—across the board—on nonperishables and perishables alike—produced on a so-called "family unit farm." One witness, franker than most of the others, stated in so many words that what he wanted was to have the gravy train start running again.

I was shocked to hear numerous witnesses state that their objective was the redistribution of the land and fairer distribution of the wealth produced on the land—a philosophy which should curl the hair of all of those who have worked and fought for the preservation of the American system of free enterprise. How foreign this thinking is to that which has always characterized typical American farmers. There is no group in America today which—as a whole—has enjoyed a higher reputation than the American farmer, for being independent, conservative, and willing to stand and fight for individual opportunity, private enterprise and, in short, for our way of life. I glory in that fact and warmly commend this organization for insistently carrying forward in that noble tradition.

The Congress must take its share of the blame for the situation which I have mentioned because, almost without exception, I found that farmers in those areas which had relied heavily on high rigid price support programs—which they had used as a crutch so long that they were afraid to try to walk without it—were the ones pressing for this additional Federal assistance. It is beyond my comprehension why these people do not look around them and discover that the only major agricultural crops in real trouble today are those very ones which have been depending too long on high price support. Many other crops, not dependent on price supports, are in healthy, prosperous condition. It is so clear that the solution to their problems—and the restoration of that wonderful feeling of self-reliance and freedom—lies in the direction of less Government support and control, rather than more.

It was considered necessary during World War II that we have high rigid price supports as an incentive to achieve the necessary increase in production for our war efforts—and it was only fair to continue them briefly until agricultural producers had sufficient time to level off their production compatible with peacetime markets. But the longtime continuation of such a program in peacetime could only lead, as it has led, to a greater loss of freedom by the farmers affected and to the piling up of huge surpluses in Government warehouses which hang over market prospects like black clouds above the horizon. The complete unsoundness of price supports large enough to induce farmers to produce crops to sell to Uncle Sam for storage has been thoroughly established.

Since 1954 the Congress has been making some progress in the effort to solve this huge agricultural problem. You are familiar of course with the long-drawn-out congressional fights which produced the Agricultural Acts of 1954 and 1956, which in the main followed the American Farm Bureau recommendations. Limited flexible price supports were provided in 1954 to replace high rigid price supports, much land was taken out of production under the soil bank, set up in 1956, and other provisions of the acts of 1954 and 1956 were steps in the right direction. Great efforts to reduce surplus supplies by various export devices and by enlarged domestic grants for food and feed programs were made—with some success. Expanded research for new uses has been helpful. Cooperating with Congress several producer groups are doing helpful things for themselves, such as advertising, trade promotion, dealer service, private research and greater use of Federal marketing agreements and orders.

This year the Agricultural Act of 1958 was passed in the effort to deal on a trial basis with those three basic crops which were in worst condition—corn, cotton and rice. This act provided an opportunity for corn and cotton growers—corn producers by referendum of the whole group, and cotton producers as individual planters—to move away from some of the domination and regimentation by the Federal Government. I was greatly pleased when our corn producers accepted by overwhelming vote the challenge to do away with acreage allotments and the artificial distinction between commercial and noncommercial areas and also to accept lower and more realistic support prices. I am proud to report that our Florida corn farmers voted 97.8 percent to do away with corn acreage allotments, leading all other States in the referendum. Your organization is entitled to greatest credit for the favorable result of the corn election. I am convinced that many cotton producers who must soon make their decisions will also choose to regain much of their independence by increasing their acreage and accepting lower price supports. Only in this way can they make American cotton competitive again in world markets and also discourage the speedy growth of the synthetic industries. In the case of rice the act applied a freeze to the current acreage allotment, which otherwise faced a ruinous 50-percent cut, and also permitted reductions in price support after the first 2 years.

In the last Congress we also increased the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture under Public Law 480 of the 83d Congress, the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954. With the aid of this act our exports of farm products have reached an alltime high. We extended the program from June 30, 1958, to December 31, 1959, at a rate of $1½ billion per year—or by a total of $2¼ billion. This program has proved quite helpful in reducing our surpluses and in improving our foreign markets, but I hope we will not become overly dependent upon it. It has proved to be an exceedingly fine emergency measure to handle surpluses, but it can never be regarded as a substitute for private trading.

It appears likely that in the forthcoming session, Congress will allow the temporary programs for corn, cotton, and rice sufficient time to demonstrate their value, but meantime will tackle the problems now faced by the other so-called basics—wheat, peanuts, and possibly even tobacco—and I hope the final results there will be as encouraging as the 1958 act promises to be with reference to cotton and corn.

Of this group, wheat is in the most serious trouble and will almost certainly require new legislation. With an existing surplus already on hand the wheat crop this year approaches 1½ billion bushels—53 percent larger than last year's crop and the largest in history. Without growing a single bushel of wheat next year we would be able to supply our domestic and export needs with 325 million bushels to spare on July 1, 1960.

Probably one of the first major agricultural bills to face us in the next Congress will be one to provide for direct payments to farmers out of the Federal Treasury. Several similar bills for this purpose were introduced in the last session of Congress, and I think we can anticipate their reintroduction and consideration early in the next Congress.

It was about 10 years ago that the so-called Brannan plan of direct production payments was originally proposed and the Congress has repeatedly refused to adopt it. This latest version leaves many questions unanswered and there are a multitude of reasons why it should not be favorably acted upon by the Congress. Among other things it would stimulate production and bring about a gerater surplus to depress the market prices, which in turn would increase the cost of the proposed program which is already estimated to run between $8 billion and $16 billion per year.

Because of the size of the refund payments the program would become one of the greatest political footballs of all times and because the proposed program is limited to the six basic commodities, the Congress undoubtedly would be subjected to strong political pressures to include more and more commodities.

I hope Congress will continue to disapprove such measures and will continue to enact constructive farm legislation working patiently step by step toward the new farm program which so evidently is required. But I cannot emphasize too strongly that the existence of the dangerous philosophy in other fields which we have been discussing, and some of the activities of the U.S. Supreme Court, the aggressiveness of ultraliberal Members of Congress, labor leaders and even some of our farmers, present a real challenge to every American.

We may as well realize that if Congress turns to the left generally in solving other important national problems, we must expect the leftwing philosophy to prevail in the field of agricultural legislation.

I commend the American Farm Bureau for its constant efforts to help lead us back to the highway of basic Americanism and away from the road which leads to a paternalistic welfare state.

I commend the cotton industry and corn producers for their strong desire shown in their support of the 1958 legislation and in their reactions since that time to alter their course away from more and more Government assistance and control and toward more freedom and self-reliance.

Thanks to groups such as this, we see some glimmer of hope that we will be able to reverse the trend which is leading us down the road to socialism—but let there be no mistake about it, we are still in the midst of a devastating attack in the name of so-called liberalism on individual and State rights intended to be protected by the drafters of our Constitution. These attacks must be met fearlessly and forcefully.

Unquestionably a mighty struggle is in the offing and we can win it only if those of us who feel strongly about preserving individual freedoms and private enterprise are willing to make real sacrifices. We cannot win it by sitting idly by while ultraliberals sell their unsound theories to unwitting people throughout every economically troubled area of the Nation.

As individuals I hope you will make your views known to your friends and your acquaintances and most of all to your Senators and Representatives in the Congress.

I feel particularly close to the American Farm Bureau, and I think one of the main reasons for this is that for years you have approached problems of national importance with the basic proposition always in mind that the continuance of individual freedom and responsibility, and the maintenance of strong, independent and responsible State and local governments, are all necessary to the preservation of stable, constitutional government.

I am glad that you, our strongest agricultural organization, are committed to this fundamental principle and it is fortunate for the Nation as a whole that you take an active interest in matters of general interest and importance outside of agriculture, realizing, of course, that if the political and economic structure of our Nation is unsound, agriculture will suffer along with everyone else.

As an organization you appear to have accepted the challenge to help lead the way back to our fundamental Constitution and to the way of life which has made this country great. I hope each of you as an individual will also accept that challenge. Agriculture has an opportunity—indeed a high responsibility—to return to the self-reliance which has characterized the American farmer throughout all of our history and point the way to the return of all of our people to basic Americanism. I wish for you the fullest measure of success in your dedicated efforts and I shall have a small part in working with you to bring about that success, in the best interest of agriculture and of all the American people.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an exceptionally fine editorial concerning the speech entitled "A Statesman From the Deep South," published in the Oklahoma City Times of December 23, 1953.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATESMAN FROM THE DEEP SOUTH

A refreshing breath of true statesmanship has come from Florida in recent days, and it is all the more gratifying because it is that of a Democrat speaking courageously after the recent Democratic victory in which many observers claimed to see a mandate for more spending, more labor domination, and a greater leftward shift coming out of the election returns.

Senator SPESSARD L. HOLLAND obviously doesn't go along with those timid souls who have been panicked into the idea that the Federal Government must now spend more money than ever, provide more "gimmes" for the voters, kowtow more cringingly to Walter Reuther and his cohorts, and wander still farther into the welfare state concept.

Addressing the recent annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation, Senator HOLLAND pulled no punches in the arena of farm policies. He said that the only major agricultural crops in real trouble today are "those very ones which have been depending too long on high price support."

He enlarged upon this theme when he said that it is clear that "the solution to the farmer's problems lies in the direction of less Government support and control rather than more."

He added: "The complete unsoundness of price supports large enough to induce farmers to produce crops to sell to Uncle Sam for storage has been thoroughly established.

"Unfortunately," he said, "many of our people cannot understand that they themselves are the Federal Government, that they pay all of its bills, and that they, the people, get nothing free from their Government. They do not realize that by looking to that Government for handouts—each of which costs them certain rights and privileges—they lose each time a little more of their freedom, and that little by little they are giving away their heritage."

Mr. HOLLAND is senior Senator from Florida and member of the strategic Senate Appropriations and Agriculture Committees. He warned his hearers that the Government "is now moving away from individual freedom and initiative toward an ever-enlarged Federal Government and a labor 'supergovernment' at the expense of the rights and privileges of States, local governments, and individuals."

In the field of labor-management relations, he said: "A real challenge which must be met by organizations such as this and the rank and file of labor is that disclosed by the McClellan committee, which has pointed up so that everyone could see, the appalling corruption, crime, and violence which exists in the high circles of some labor unions. Gang bosses, goon squads, bribery, and embezzlement have no more place among unions than they have among our other American institutions. This situation should cause great concern to all Americans and to the agricultural producers in particular, because the trucking industry performs a vital and necessary service in getting a large part of your produce to the marketplace. An extended tieup of this industry at harvesttime could wreck entire segments of agriculture, and bankrupt thousands of farmers, as well as handlers and processors of farm products, throughout the Nation."

Undoubtedly the majority of Oklahoma voters, regardless of party, wish that equally courageous and statesmanlike utterances might come from Members of the Oklahoma delegation in the House and Senate.

What Will Congress Do?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 20, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my remarks to the Greater Lawrence Chamber of Commerce, at Lawrence, Mass., on January 16, 1959:

WHAT WILL CONGRESS DO?

(Preview of 1st sess., 86th Cong., for Greater Lawrence Chamber of Commerce, Friday, January 16, 1959, Yankee Doodle Restaurant)

Greetings, the 1st session of the 86th Congress went to work on January 7.

Thousands of bills will be introduced.

Within the next 6 or 7 months, about 1,000 will be enacted into law. Some will affect, directly or indirectly, every inhabitant of the United States and its Territories. A few will have some influence on the economies and the peoples of other nations. A hundred or more private bills concerning immigration cases and claims against the Government will touch upon the lives of separate individuals.

The Congress is composed of the U.S. Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives. On some issues, their views will coincide; on others they will differ. Within each Chamber, and within each political party, there are different attitudes on social and economic problems. Out of this representative variety, the final bill that is enacted into law usually reflects adjustment and compromise.

In trying to estimate what Congress is likely to do, I shall restrict myself to the House of Representatives and the influence of its sizable Democratic majority.

In that context, I expect somewhat larger appropriations than those recommended by the President in his budget for the fiscal year of 1960 that begins on July 1, 1959.

Last year at this time, the Congress was worried by the deepening recession, and by the scientific breakthroughs achieved by Soviet Russia with their serious military, economic, and psychological challenge to the security of the free world.

The legislation passed in 1958 was shaped by our efforts to overcome these problems.

All of us are encouraged by the fact that the recession is largely over, but there is no letup in the Communist drive to master the space that surrounds the earth.

Although we have been roused from our complacency, and are making efforts to achieve leadership in the space age, there is widespread concern that the administration is not putting enough emphasis on this program.

The latest success of the Russians is a sober reminder that we are up against the most formidable competition; in education, industrial production, international trade, and in scientific progress.

We are trying to close the "missile gap"—which means that the Russians are presently ahead of us on this crucial frontier.

The plain fact is that if it comes to a choice between a balanced budget or an unbalanced budget that will not curtail our defense needs, there is no choice. We cannot afford to fall behind.

Not that the health and soundness of our domestic economy can be ignored. This is the foundation upon which all else depends. But economic activity is on the rise which means that Federal revenues will increase. If, during the fiscal year that starts on July 1, we realize a prosperity greater than we anticipate at the moment, expenditures somewhat larger than those recommended by the President can be met by the increase in Federal revenues. Even if this should not happen, we cannot gamble with national defense just for the sake of a balanced budget.

Some changes in the present tax laws are probable.

Among these are faster depreciation on capital investment to offset increasing obsolescence and inflation; revision of the rules on corporate distributions and adjustments, estates and trusts, and partnerships. There will be a move to establish a higher tax formula for life insurance companies. Other Congressmen will push legislation permitting deductions for funds put aside by the self-employed for their retirement.

Powerful lobbies will block the proposed reduction in the 27.5 oil and gas depletion allowance.

There will be proposals to raise personal income tax exemptions and to hike parcel post rates. Only the latter is apt to go through.

There is much work to be done in plugging tax loopholes and in spreading the burden in a more equitable manner, but it does not seem possible that any general revision of the Internal Revenue Code can become effective before 1961.

Some Congressmen want lower interest rates on FHA and VA housing. Others believe that an increase of interest rates on mortgages insured under Government programs is needed in order to make these mortgages more appealing to investors. The President, through his veto power, may be the determining factor on this issue.

It is likely that the administration and the Congress will both approve a higher minimum wage, and some extension of social security. Although a formula to provide hospital and medical care for those on old-age pension will be enacted into law at some future date, I doubt if a satisfactory plan can be worked out at this session.

In the area of labor legislation, the Kennedy-Ives bill to require financial accounting by unions, and the free election of union officers, is almost certain to prevail.

The problem of transportation, especially the transportation of people, is becoming more difficult every day. It is not simply the question of enabling people to travel from their homes to their places of employment in the morning, and to return in the late afternoon. In our complex society, transportation is the circulation system that sustains the life of a modern economy.

The impact of the automobile is greater than we realize, forcing crowded cities to accommodate themselves to it, and having a profound effect upon other modes of transportation.

I think all of us have been startled sooner or later by the personal observation that there are more cars on the streets than there are pedestrians on the sidewalks.

Railroads and buslines and the merchants on our main streets have been hurt by this explosive development in the numbers and in the use of the private automobile with its resulting complications.

Responding to these pressures, a previous Congress had authorized a Federal program to relieve traffic congestion by the construction of an expanded interstate highway system.

Due to rising costs, Congress may reluctantly approve some but not all of the 1½-cent increase in the gasoline tax to be requested by the President.

Further aid to railroads, steamship subsidies, and more money for airport improvements are necessary because our economy cannot grow without a modern and efficient transportation system, public as well as private, to meet its demands. In the background but looming large is the need of facilities-in-being for emergency service to national security and civil defense.

One of the paradoxes of our national life is the farm problem or what to do with our agricultural surpluses. Various experiments over a whole generation have failed to solve it. We want to keep the farmers in business because we have to. That means we cannot dump their surpluses on the market to send the prices they receive for their products so low that they cannot earn a living by farming. At the same time, we will not jack up the price of food through extreme price supports for the farmers at the expense of the consumers. This is a very complex problem but I expect that this session of the Congress will be moderate in designing a farm aid program.

On the domestic issues that do not involve spending, the struggle over civil rights is most controversial.

This is an emotional issue on both sides. Where force will not achieve the understanding, and the cooperation, that are necessary for a solution. A law to make church and school bombings a Federal crime will be passed, for no self-respecting American, North or South, no matter what his religious faith or his racial origin, will stand for such vicious opposition to the rights of others. Steps will be taken to protect the voting rights of Negroes and other minority groups. Congress, however, will not insist on school integration, leaving to the States the responsibility of working out the gradual adjustments under the stimulus of an enlightened public opinion.

Different sections of our country have economic interests which are of major importance to them, but not to other areas. The Middle West believes that aid to agriculture should have top priority. The Rocky Mountain States, and their representatives, work hard to assist the mining industry. Texas, Oklahoma, and California are alert in promoting legislation that will benefit the development of their oil resources.

We, in New England, are mainly concerned with the problems of our textile and fishing industries, striving to protect them from the increasing dangers of foreign competition.

Although we believe in the principle of reciprocal trade, knowing that an increase in commerce among the nations on a fairly competitive basis results in shared progress, we are aware that our textile and fishing industries are being priced out of the domestic market by low-cost imports from abroad. This is not reciprocal trade in the genuine meaning of the term. It is a form of ruthless horsetrading to open up foreign markets for selected American industries, while opening up American markets to foreign products by sacrificing a few of our basic industries.

The increasing imports of foreign textiles and foreign fish products is a threat to the New England economy, and particularly that of Massachusetts.

In the present session of the Congress, the New England delegation will have to fight persistently, against formidable odds, to win some measure of protection for these embattled industries. But we must not stop with defensive measures. A positive and affirmative program of aid to these industries is also required to improve their competitive position.

The decline of the once dominant New England textile industry has left a gap which has been hard to fill.

The depressed areas, or labor-surplus areas, have made valiant efforts to attract new and diversified industries as replacements for the ones they have lost.

They have accomplished much, but it is apparent that they cannot do the whole job on their own.

Those of us who first proposed Federal legislation to assist in the solution of this new problem which will arise time and again in our changing economy, were opposed by those who resist any idea that is new simply because it is new.

But the public has been in a more receptive mood toward those proposals which are designed to meet problems instead of avoiding them.

At the risk of injecting a political note, I would remind you of the Senator who was defeated last year and who blamed the President's veto of the area redevelopment bill for the switch in voter sentiment.

With the influx of new Congressmen, reflecting public discontent with standpat policies, I believe that a bill that will provide Federal loans and minor grants to help redevelop labor-surplus areas will be passed this year, even if it should have to overcome another veto.

Related to this, and to slum clearance and urban renewal, and housing, is legislation to help local governments in the development of community facilities such as water systems, sewers, streets, and schools. With the dislocations resulting from industrial, military, and population shifts many communities are finding it difficult to provide or maintain adequate facilities. The President is certain to oppose this type of legislation. I would say that its prospects are no better than 50–50.

The United States is spending substantial sums in the development of atomic weapons. For reasons of security, the details are not made available to the public.

But nuclear energy, applied to peaceful purposes, holds great promise for progress in many fields. In the 13 years since the discovery of this vast potential, the Congress has repeatedly asked why greater progress in the application of atomic power to generate electricity for industrial and household use has not been realized.

This is an important issue, and a sensitive one, that will not make the headlines.

In the background, however, is the fear on the part of the private utilities that the Government may dominate development of the atom.

At last they are making a concerted effort to prove that they can do the job better than the Government. In the last 4 years they have invested more than $500 million on atomic projects.

The Congress believes that more can and should be done, either through Government assistance or through pilot plants built and operated by the Government. The former method is preferred. The Congress is determined to spur the development of atomic power for peaceful purposes and will appropriate funds for that objective.

The technical problems to be solved before atomic energy can compete with the fossil fuels are difficult, but the advantages to be reaped are even greater. Congress wants to accelerate the program.

The economic recovery of Western Europe is an encouraging fact that has helped to strengthen the free world's position. This has been accomplished, in part, by the assistance we have given to them. Now that their need is much less, economic aid to them will be reduced. Some of our South American neighbors, however, are having difficulties, and it may be necessary to bolster their economies.

Under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, Congress recognized the special problems which handicap small- and medium-sized firms. Under the Johnson-Patman Act it is setting up a system whereby they will be able to obtain equity and long-term debt financing, heretofore unavailable, from any governmental lending authority, or through financial institutions.

As Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, coauthor of the bill, told the House, this legislation has two goals:

"First, the individual investment decisions should not be made by a bureau in Washington, but by local businessmen who will be backing their decisions with substantial amounts of their own money.

"The second goal of the system is that it should provide for private capital to come in and take over complete ownership and operation of the system."

The Small Business Committee, and the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House will make investigations and studies of further practical aids to small business. It is possible that an expanded aid program, moderate in scale, may come up for a vote at this session.

There are indications that the administration will try to curtail the program of veterans' benefits, but I am certain that it will not succeed.

There are sincere differences of opinion within the Congress. To draw the line between that which is necessary for the Nation and that which is merely desirable is not as easy as it may sound. In making up our minds, we cannot ignore political considerations, or the necessity of being guided by an informed public opinion.

There is no official within the administration, and no Member of Congress who can accurately foresee what the situation will be as we come up to the presidential and congressional campaigns of 1960.

The administration is shaping its policies in the belief that a balanced budget will insure prosperity and peace, and will be approved by the electorate in 1960.

The Congress, that is, a majority of its Members, is not against a balanced budget. After taking stock of conditions, both at home and abroad, most Members will agree that we cannot afford the risk of a near budget that would cramp our progress and imperil our security.

Lipservice to education is not enough.

When our survival depends more and more on scientific and technological skills, what was good enough in the past is not sufficient today.

A major effort is required to expand and improve our educational system.

New classrooms, laboratories, research facilities, and scholarships must be provided. We must raise the prestige, the incentives, and the rewards for the teaching profession commensurate with our country's urgent need for the very best.

Congress means business on this compelling issue.

Dozens of bills have already been introduced dealing exclusively with aids to education. We are disturbed by the fact that many American high school students would probably flunk a Russian high school examination in mathematics, and in the sciences. We intend to stimulate and assist in the building of an improved educational system that will not only develop the mental capacities of our youth, but will teach them to appreciate as never before the rights and responsibilities of freedom.

There are no escalators to progress and security.

In this fast changing world, individuals as well as nations need ever more knowledge and better equipment to prevail over the deadly challenge of communism.

Last year we were facing up to the economic recession and to the serious fact that we were behind the Russians in missile development.

We are leaving the recession behind us as there are definite signs of economic recovery in January 1959.

But we are still behind the Soviet in rocket technology and in space exploration.

As a people we have always stressed the value of competition, but in this critical area we do not seem to realize what is at stake.

One or two or six months from now we will be thrilled by the news of a U.S. success in the pioneering of space, and we will bask in self-satisfaction until the Russians rocket a man into space far beyond the earth and bring him back.

Then we will look for someone to blame.

Not realizing that complacency is our worst enemy.

We cannot stand still, content with the familiar routines because neither life nor history will mark time.

We have only to look at the experience of our own community to learn that we must keep up with progress. For generations, textiles was the dominant industry. We had become so adjusted to it that we could not foresee the day when the economic base of Greater Lawrence would be entirely different, yet within a few years the pattern has been completely altered. The old textile giants have gone; and are being replaced by young and vigorous and growing industries.

It is so with our Nation.

The population and its needs are expanding.

And our responsibilities as the leader of the free world are increasing.

To meet these the attitudes, the instruments, and the yardsticks of 1939—or 1929—are obsolete.

The great virtue of freedom is its flexibility.

We have seen this at work in American industry which is never content with things as they are.

In 1940, nuclear energy was only a mathematical equation on the blackboards of the scientists.

In 1956, Americans would laugh at the suggestion that man would soon be able to send rockets hundreds of thousands of miles into space.

In 1959 both are accomplished facts.

It is my opinion that the administration is reluctant to make the hard decisions, and to exert the leadership that is required to provide for genuine progress and security.

This is human but unrealistic.

I would like to tell you that the budget is going to be slashed by billions, and that a generous tax reduction will be approved soon, and overwhelmingly. This is the news that we would prefer to hear.

But, to quote the President himself in his recent state of the Union message, we are confronted with a question which is "as old as history," whether a government based upon liberty can endure when it is ceaselessly challenged by a dictatorship with growing economic and military power.

The Congress is not satisfied with the current rate of development in our missile and space exploration programs.

There is widespread feeling among the Members that we are not doing enough.

Therefore, on this issue which will overshadow all others, the Congress will vote larger appropriations than the President deems necessary, and will insist on a major and sustained program that will regain and hold the lead for the United States.

Even though there are many new and liberal Members in the House of Representatives, I do not anticipate a runaway spending spree. Under the knowing and experienced guidance of Speaker SAM RAYBURN, and Majority Leader JOHN MCCORMACK, I believe that the first session will legislate a program that will basically suit the Nation's needs.

It will not be a timid session nor a reckless one.

But the Congress will, in the year of 1959—and to the best of its ability—do those things which must be done under the mandate calling for the up-to-date programs and the courageous leadership that it received from the people last November.

For it is aware that a big, and growing, and changing nation like ours must not fall behind the pace of history as it is being made today.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 21, 1959

The Senate met at 11:45 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, midst all the busy shuttles of legislation, as here is woven the fabric of law and order, nourishing and shielding the life of our democracy, may we not be so enmeshed in the immediate mechanics of our tasks as to lose sight of the total pattern shown in the mount of vision.

And now at this altar of the Nation's faith we lift up the deep concern of the citizens of Alaska as they gaze with anxious eyes upon the latest star which shines in the flag of the Republic, as their young Governor, with all his radiant visions of the future, fights for his life in a western hospital. We would join the representatives of this far-stretching part of our America in intercession that there may be the healing of the seamless dress beside that bed of pain; and that, within Thy will, the dedicated ministries of doctors and nurses may be Thy human channels for his restoration to health and to dedicated service to Alaska and the Nation to which he has pledged his all. We ask it in the name of the Great Physician. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 20, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting a nomination was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Philip W. Bonsal, of the District of Columbia, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Cuba, vice Earl E. T. Smith, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, notified the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of section 8002 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the Speaker had appointed Mr. MILLS of Arkansas, Mr. FORAND of Rhode Island, Mr. KING of California, Mr. REED of New York, and Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania as members of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation on the part of the House.

The message also notified the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 172, 85th Congress, the Speaker had appointed Mr. MCMILLAN of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, and Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia as members of the Joint Congressional Committee To Investigate Matters Pertaining to the Growth and Expansion of the District of Columbia on the part of the House.

The message announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3) requesting the President to designate the week of January 25, 1959, as National Junior Achievement Week.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of other routine business, with statements limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the call of the roll be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COTTON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 12:10 it be in order for the Chair to declare a recess, in order that Senators may assemble and march to the other body, for a joint meeting, and that the recess be taken subject to the call of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, while a substantial number of Members are present, I should like to ask the majority leader what the legislative program will be for tomorrow, and possibly for the next day and for the remainder of the week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Only yesterday the Senate entered an order completing the committee assignments. So far as I am informed, we plan no legislation this week. I would be agreeable to having the Senate go over as long as it can without obtaining the consent of the other body; and following the joint meeting I shall work out with the distinguished minority leader some plan that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. All Senators may be on notice that we do not expect any yea-and-nay votes this week; I should not think there would be any for several days yet, because the committees are just being formed, and they will have to be given time to hold hearings and then to report bills.

REPEAL EXCISE TAXES ON TRANSPORTATION—RESOLUTION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners has urged the repeal of the excise taxes on transportation. The Lions Club of Welch, W. Va., through its secretary, has sent a copy of the resolution to me. I submit it and ask that it be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION BY NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RAILROAD AND UTILITIES COMMISSIONERS URGING REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES ON COMMUNICATION SERVICES AND TRANSPORTATION OF PERSONS, ADOPTED NOVEMBER 20, 1958

Whereas the Federal excise taxes on public utility and transportation services were initially levied or greatly increased during World War II to help defray war costs and to discourage unnecessary use of such services; and

Whereas Congress has acted to remove a substantial portion of this discriminatory tax burden on public utility and transportation services by elimination of excise taxes on the use of electrical energy and the shipment of goods and property; and

Whereas today, 13 years after cessation of hostilities, the excise taxes on communication services and the for-hire transportation of persons are still in effect and are continuing to discourage the public use of these services which are now the only services, regulated or unregulated, against which any Federal excise taxes are levied; and

Whereas a committee of the 85th Congress rejected a proposal for the enactment of legislation which would have continued the Federal excise tax on local telephone service at a lesser rate and which also would have required the imposition of the balance of this unpopular tax by the individual States as a means of financing a proposed transfer to the States of certain activities completely unrelated to communication services; and

Whereas the Joint Federal-State Action Committee has recommended that Congress authorize distribution for a period of 5 years, 40 percent of the present Federal excise tax on local telephone service to the States in such amounts as to provide revenues equivalent to 140 percent of Federal grants now being made to the respective States to carry on vocational eductaion, and to construct facilities for abatement of water pollution, which are completely unrelated to communications services; and

Whereas the proposal of the Joint Federal-State Action Committee would tend to cause the States to pass laws imposing excise taxes on local telephone service and would tend to make such taxes a permanent part of the tax structure of both the Federal and State Governments: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners is of the opinion that the discriminatory excise taxes on communication and transportation services are not in the public interest, that such taxes should not continue to be levied by the Federal Government; and

Resolved further, That any similar tax on communications should not be levied by the individual States against the users of this essential service as a means of financing specific programs which bear no relation to the service taxes; and

Resolved further, That Congress is hereby petitioned to terminate the discriminatory excise taxes on communication and transportation services at the earliest possible date; and

Resolved further, That the special committee on repeal of excise taxes, the committee on legislation, and the legal officers of the association are hereby authorized to appear on behalf of the association before any committee of Congress at any hearing which may be hereafter held upon legislation pertaining to the above matters and to take such further action as may be appropriate to accomplish the objectives of the association in respect to the repeal of the excise taxes on both communication services and transportation of persons.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS—RESOLUTION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 10, which would establish a Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the Senate structure. I have received a resolution from the Department of West Virginia Veterans of Foreign Affairs endorsing the proposal for a Committee on Veterans' Affairs. I submit the resolution for appropriate reference.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 18, 1959.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Resolution to establish a Veterans' Affairs Committee in the U.S. Senate

Whereas the United States does not have a Veterans' Affairs Committee; and

Whereas the veteran population of the United States comprises of some 22 million citizens and the Veterans of Foreign Wars feel that this large segment of our population should be represented by a Veterans' Affairs Committee in the U.S. Senate; and

Whereas veterans legislation is given to Senate committees that are already overloaded with pressing legislation and therefore they do not have the time to give the veterans legislation the proper attention: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of West Virginia Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, in conference assembled in Elkins, W.Va., this 17th day of January 1959, That we do hereby go on record as favoring a Veterans' Affairs Committee in the U.S. Senate and that copies of this resolution be forwarded immediately by telegram to Senators JENNINGS RANDOLPH and ROBERT C. BYRD, requesting their support of such a bill.

RALPH STUMP,
Adjutant, Department of West Virginia, VFW.
SOUTH CHARLESTON, W. VA.

JOHN H. MOORE,
Commander, Department of West Virginia, VFW.
EAST HUNTINGTON, W. VA.

Mr. DIRKSEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 35), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 609) entitled "A bill for the relief of the estate of Gregory J. Kessenich" now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims; and the court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28 of the United States Code and report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, giving such findings of fact and conclusions thereon as shall be sufficient to inform the Congress of the nature and character of the demand as a claim, legal or equitable, against the United States and the amount, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimant.

CONSTRUCTION OF BARDWELL RESERVOIR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on July 25 last year, I introduced Senate bill 4192, modifying the plan for improvement of the Trinity River and its tributaries, by authorizing the construction of Bardwell Reservoir, on Waxahachie Creek, Tex.

Although less than a month remained of the 85th Congress, the distinguished Public Works Committee acted promptly on the bill, and the Senate passed it on August 15 by a unanimous vote. There was not enough time, however, for the House to complete action on it before adjournment. So I am introducing the same bill again today.

Mr. President, we have created a U.S. Study Commission for our Texas river basins. We have charged it with developing a full and comprehensive plan for the use and control of water—the most valuable natural resource we possess. It is not too much to say that we look to it for the key to our future.

But the creation of this Commission has not in any way lessened the responsibility of Congress and the Corps of Engineers for action now. The floods will not wait for the Commission's recommendations. The droughts will not wait. Dams and reservoirs must be built, if we are to avoid the ravages of floodwaters and ruinous droughts.

According to the Corps of Engineers, Bardwell Reservoir is an essential element in any comprehensive plan for control and development of water resources in the Trinity River Basin.

Floods along Waxahachie Creek have caused annual damages of an estimated $465,000 to farmlands, transportation facilities, and utilities. Floodwaters from this creek have contributed heavily to destruction downstream along the lower Trinity.

The cost of Bardwell Reservoir to the United States is estimated at $5,104,000. Reimbursable water conservation would amount to $1,880,000. The Public Works Committee last year found that the benefits from the reservoir would substantially exceed the costs.

My good friend, OLIN TEAGUE, has introduced an identical bill in the House of Representatives.

I have high hopes, Mr. President, that the 86th Congress will see the enactment of this necessary legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 601) to authorize and provide for the construction of the Bardwell Reservoir, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

ERECTION BY BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA OF A MEMORIAL ON PUBLIC GROUND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill providing for the erection of a memorial statue on public grounds in the District of Columbia. The statue would honor the millions of American men and boys who have belonged to the Boy Scouts of America.

Mr. President, the Boy Scouts of America will celebrate the 50th anniversary of their founding in 1960. They contemplate holding their National Council meeting in Washington during that year. I think it appropriate that the Congress recognize their great service to American youth, by granting them the right to place a memorial statue on public ground in the Capital City.

The memorial would be erected at no cost to the United States. Its location and design would be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission on Fine Arts, and the National Capital Planning Commission.

Twenty-seven million boys have been members of the Boy Scouts. 8,750,000 men have served as leaders. Many lives have been enriched by experience in the Scouts; and, as a result, the quality of our national life has been enriched, as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 602) authorizing the Boy Scouts of America to erect a memorial on public grounds in the District of Columbia to honor the members and leaders of such organization, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the conservation and development of urban communities, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the section-by-section analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 612) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the conservation and development of urban communities, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BENNETT (for Mr. CAPEHART), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The section-by-section analysis presented by Mr. BENNETT is as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF HOUSING ACT OF 1959 PROPOSED BY HOUSING AND FINANCE AGENCY

Section 1. Short title.

TITLE I—FHA INSURANCE

Section 101. Extension of FHA title I home repair and improvement program: This section would provide for an indefinite extension of the title I home repair and improvement loan insurance program which would otherwise expire on September 30, 1959. Under this program, the FHA insures qualified lending institutions against loss within prescribed limits on loans made to finance alterations, repairs and improvements in connection with existing structures and the building of new nonresidential structures. FHA's liability is limited to 10 percent of the total amount of all title I loans made by the individual insured lending institution. Also, under co-insurance provisions enacted in 1954, FHA's liability is limited to 90 percent of the loss on each individual loan.

The importance of this program to the maintenance of the Nation's housing inventory, to the carrying out of urban renewal operations in blighted or declining neighborhoods, and to a continuing volume of employment and activity in the home construction industry provides ample justification for recognizing by statute that the title I program of loan insurance for property improvements should be a permanent part of FHA operations.

The co-insurance provisions for this program enacted in 1954, coupled with improved standards for lender and dealer operations and with more comprehensive FHA supervision of lender operations, has markedly reduced the level of claims and FHA net losses under the program. As a consequence, it has been possible to reduce the FHA insurance premium from three-fourths of 1 percent per year to one-half of 1 percent per year, based on the net proceeds of the loan.

Statutory increases enacted in 1956 in the maximum loan amount to $3,500 for regular loans and in repayment period to 5 years, from previous limits of $2,500 and 3 years, have been beneficial in enabling title I financing to cover a greater range of property improvements. This, in turn, is helpful to local urban renewal programs. More than 10 percent of the total net proceeds of loans insured under title I in 1957 was covered by loans with face amounts of $3,000 or more.

Section 102. Removal of general mortgage insurance authorization limits: This section would remove from the National Housing Act all established limitations on the amounts of aggregate insurance volume which may be written by the Agency or which may be outstanding at any one time under its various insurance programs, exclusive of title VIII (military housing). Its effect is to authorize FHA to accept for insurance any volume of loans submitted by private lenders if these loans conform to the standards established by statute and by FHA administrative rules under the various insurance programs of the Agency, including the repair and improvement loan program.

This amendment is important for several reasons. First, the volume of applications for FHA mortgage insurance during any period of time is not determined by FHA actions or programing but rather by factors and developments in the national economy and in the general money market which are not susceptible to even reasonably accurate prediction. Illustrative of extremes in this condition have been operations in the fiscal year 1957 and the present fiscal year. In the earlier year, there was no net use of the general insurance authorization under section 217 of the National Housing Act; while in the present 12-month period, use of authorization may exceed $9 billion. Yet initial budget projections and congressional budget authorizations in both cases contemplated operations involving about $3 billion of net use of authorization. Changes in money market conditions, in general economic conditions, in FHA enabling legislation, and in operations of related Government programs which occurred after the time of initial budget projections all contributed to causing the wide variance between initial projections of operations and actual volume. Second, the adoption of the Certified Agency Procedure in section 203 operations creates a volume of insurance commitments which is not susceptible to refined control by FHA. Third, the main effect of authorization limitations is oftentimes a serious and undesirable disturbance to private home construction and financing. Because of recurring depletion of insurance authorization, industry has been time after time required to adjust its pace of planning and operations to a restricted flow of FHA commitments rather than to the economic needs of the Nation. Fourth, the real risk of financial burden on the U.S. Treasury, if any, is determined by the character and duration of insurance programs authorized and the effectiveness of FHA underwriting processes, rather than by arbitrary ceilings on the maximum level of insured unpaid balances of loans.

The proposed removal of ceilings on insurance authorizations for FHA permanent insurance programs is therefore urgently recommended.

SECTION 103. Technical Provisions Relating to Payment of Insurance by FHA: Section 204 of the National Housing Act contains a number of provisions which govern the obligations of the FHA to the mortgagee where there has been a default under a mortgage on sales housing financed under section 203 of the act, the section authorizing FHA's basic program of assistance for one- to four-family homes. Similar provisions governing the FHA's insurance obligations are necessary in connection with each of the following special sales housing programs: (1) Section 8, which at one time governed the program (now governed by section 203(i)) for low-cost, single-family homes in outlying areas; (2) section 213 which includes assistance for homes constructed by cooperatives for their own members; (3) section 220 which includes assistance for sales housing in urban renewal areas; (4) section 221 which includes a sales housing program for persons displaced from urban renewal areas or by governmental action; (5) section 222 which provides special benefits in financing homes for servicemen; and (6) section 809 which assists sales housing for essential civilian employees at military research or development installations. The provisions governing the payment of insurance are incorporated in each of the six listed sections by cross references to provisions in section 204.

As the six listed sections were added or amended from time to time and as section 204 was amended from time to time, oversights in drafting resulted in the failure to make all the appropriate cross references to all the appropriate provisions in section 204. Section 103 of this bill would correct these drafting oversights which have resulted in inconsistencies in FHA's dealings with mortgagees and in troublesome problems both in administration and in managing foreclosed properties.

Subsection (a) would add to section 8 of the National Housing Act a cross reference to subsections (j) and (k) of section 204 of that act. Subsection 204(j) permits termination of the mortgagee's liability for payment of mortgage insurance premiums in those cases where the mortgagee forecloses on the mortgaged property but informs the Commissioner that it does not intend to convey the property to FHA in exchange for debentures. Upon such notification (which terminates FHA's insurance liability), the FHA terminates the mortgagee's obligation to pay subsequent mortgage insurance premiums. Similar termination of the mortgagee's obligation results under section 204(j) when FHA's insurance liability terminates because the mortgage has been prepaid in full.

Subsection 204(k) permits the Federal Housing Commissioner to authorize mortgagees to make reimbursable expenditures for protection of properties during the period commencing with the institution of foreclosure and continuing until the Commissioner takes title to the property. Subsection (k) also permits terminating the mortgagee's obligation to pay mortgage insurance premiums when an application for debentures has been filed under the insurance contract. This makes it unnecesary for the mortgagee to pay insurance premiums up to the date of acceptance of title by the FHA and then have the amount of these premium payments included in the debentures which the FHA issues to the mortgagee. The provision thus eliminates unnecessary procedures and payments of interest by FHA, there being no point in having the FHA collect sums of money from the mortgagee which would only have to be repaid with interest.

Subsection (b) of section 103 of the bill would similarly add the cross reference to section 204(k) of the National Housing Act to sections 213, 220, 221, 222, and 809 of that act. Thus, this entire section is merely a technical amendment.

Section 104. Increased mortgage amounts under section 203 and trade-in house program: This section would make two amendments in section 203 of the National Housing Act which authorizes FHA's basic mortgage insurance program for sales housing. The first amendment would increase the maximum mortgage amount on single-family and two-family homes insured under the basic section 203 and related programs from $20,000 to $25,000. The three- and four-family maximums of $27,500 and $35,000 would remain unchanged, and no change is proposed in the maximum loan-to-value formula established by Public Law 85-364, the act to stimulate residential construction.

Under present loan limits, maximum loan-to-value ratio loans are available only on one- and two-family homes valued up to $22,850. The $25,000 maximum mortgage would permit a maximum loan of 83.3 percent on a $30,000 home. This may be compared with the $16,000, 80 percent maximum loan which was permitted by the original National Housing Act in 1934. In the meanwhile, construction costs have about trebled, but FHA maximum loan amounts have lagged behind. It is estimated that about one-fifth of the new homes in metropolitan areas are in price ranges too high to be financed with maximum loan-value ratio FHA insured mortgages. This section of the bill would make FHA insurance available to a somewhat larger section of the home-buying public. The bulk of FHA operations will, of course, continue to be in the field of low- and medium-priced homes.

The second amendment of section 203 would make the trade-in house program more effective by providing that a nonoccupant-owner in the case of section 203 existing single-family homes may receive the same maximum mortgage amount as an owner-occupant, with the requirement that the nonoccupant-owner must place in escrow 15 percent of the outstanding principal mortgage amount until such time as he sells the property to an owner-occupant. If prior to the due date of the 18th monthly amortization payment, the property has not been sold to an owner-occupant, the 15 percent held in escrow would be applied to a reduction in the mortgage amount.

In the residential housing market today a great majority of new home purchasers already own a home and wish to acquire larger or improved accommodations. Most of them need to use the equity in the existing home as part of the downpayment on a new home. Thus, builders and realtors are increasingly finding it necessary to accept trade-in houses on new house sales. The proposed amendment will greatly aid the existing homeowner in trading for a new house. It will enable the builder or realtor to place a mortgage on the old house equivalent to that which could be obtained when a purchaser for the house has been found. It provides the builder up to 18 months to resell the trade-in house and transfer the mortgage to the new purchaser and thus eliminate much of one set of closing costs. In the case of lower price properties, this saving can be equal to the FHA required downpayment. As soon as the builder resells the trade-in house to an owner-occupant, the 15 percent held in escrow is released to him.

Section 105. Inclusion of Certain Costs in Debentures: This section would amend section 204(k) of the National Housing Act to permit the FHA to include in the debentures which are paid to mortgagees in cases of default certain costs which the mortgagees must incur in order to enable them to convey good title to the Commissioner.

Section 204 presently permits, with respect to the computation of items included in the debentures, a portion of foreclosure costs. However, no provision is made for certain costs of acquisition and for costs of conveying the property to the Commissioner and evidencing good title in him. These costs which are distinguished from costs that can be clearly attributed to the foreclosure proceeding itself, are not now eligible for inclusion. Thus FHA, in computing debenture claims, requires mortgagees to break down their total costs to separate those directly chargeable to the legal proceedings of foreclosure from those chargeable to the preparation of the deed from the mortgagee to the Commissioner and to obtaining title evidence showing good title in the Commissioner. The necessity for this separation creates a material delay in processing debenture applications and is most difficult to justify to mortgagees and their counsel.

The dollar amount involved in the usual home mortgage case is relatively small and made up of such items as the cost of preparing a deed, notary's fees, recording charges for the deed, and the cost of title evidence. This section of the bill would permit including these costs in the debentures in the same manner as presently allowed with respect to identified foreclosure costs.

The element of coinsurance which is presently maintained with respect to foreclosure costs would be continued. That is, FHA would allow in the debentures two-thirds of the cost while the mortgagee would receive the remaining one-third in its certificate of claim.

The section would also incorporate a technical reference to the new section 229 of the National Housing Act proposed to be added by another section of the bill which is explained below.

Section 106. Regular FHA Rental Housing Program—Interest Rate and Miscellaneous Changes: This section would enact a number of amendments to section 207 of the National Housing Act, which authorizes FHA's regular rental housing program. The first two numbered amendments would merely remove references to elderly persons' housing from section 207. This is a technical change which is necessary if, as explained below, another section of this bill adds a new section to the National Housing Act, dealing with rental housing for the elderly.

The third numbered amendment would increase the statutory maximum interest rate on rental housing mortgages insured under section 207 from 4½ to 5½ percent. At the present 4½-percent rate, significant discounts are reported for project mortgages, approximately equal to one-half point of interest earnings in yield computations. The treatment of discounts in valuation procedures raises technical problems which tend to discourage development of multi-family projects during periods of tight money.

Since rental projects are characteristically undertaken only as a business venture, it is reasonable to expect that the entire cost of mortgage money will be understood and carefully bargained for by prospective project sponsors. Under these circumstances, there appears to be no reason why the statute should require interest rates for these projects to be fixed by the FHA at levels lower than the money market requires and lower than would prevail as a result of competitive bargaining in the development of rental projects. The adoption of this section would permit the FHA Commissioner to establish maximum interest rates with the effectiveness of the market process in mind with respect to the rental projects, thereby encouraging the development of additional needed rental housing.

The fourth numbered amendment would add a new subsection (r) to section 207 which would permit the Commissioner to assess service charges against mortgagors whenever, as a result of defaults, the mortgagees assign the mortgages to FHA in exchange for debentures. Under the present statute, mortgagees have the option in project programs of assigning mortgages in default and taking a reduced amount of debentures rather than foreclosing and conveying title to the properties to the Commissioner. If a mortgage is so assigned, the mortgagor is not obligated to pay a mortgage insurance premium, as the mortgage, while held by the Commisisoner, is not an insured mortgage. Technically, a mortgagor could permit an intentional default under an insured mortgage with the expectation that the mortgagee would assign the mortgage, thus relieving the mortgagor of the liability for the payment of the one-half percent mortgage insure premium. This section would authorize the Commissioner in such cases to assess service charges, so long as he holds the mortgage, which cannot exceed the amount of the original mortgage insurance premiums. As drafted, this amendment would permit uniform procedures under all FHA programs, not merely under the section 207 program.

Section 107. Prevailing Wage Requirement: This section is occasioned by the sections explained below which would authorize mortgage insurance for rental projects for profit built for families displaced by governmental action or for elderly persons. These rental projects would, under this section, be made subject to the same prevailing wage requirements as now aply to rental projects insured under sections 207, 220, and 803 of the National Housing Act and to cooperative housing insured under section 213 of that act.

Section 108. Cooperative housing—interest rate and commercial and community facilities: The first numbered amendment contained in this section would provide for increasing the statutory maximum interest rate on section 213 management-type cooperative housing projects from 4½ percent to 5½ percent and on section 213 sales-type housing from 5 percent to a rate, not in excess of 6 percent, as the Commissioner finds necessary to meet the mortgage market. The same reasons, discussed above, which justify the interest rate change in the section 207 rental housing program apply to the section 213 management-type cooperative housing program. In addition, with respect to sales-type cooperative housing, the present statutory 5 percent limitation is inconsistent with both the 5¼ percent regulatory and the 6 percent statutory ceilings which now apply to other FHA-aided sales-type housing.

The second amendment contained in this section would permit inclusion of commercial facilities and community facilities in investor-sponsored, management-type cooperative projects insured under section 213 of the National Housing Act. Since investor-sponsored projects are intended to operate in the same manner as other management-type cooperatives, it is desirable that the types of facilities permissible be the same under both methods of development.

Section 109. Mortgage ceilings in Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii: Section 214 of the National Housing Act authorizes FHA to make the various mortgage ceilings of the act up to 50 percent higher for Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii. A question has been raised as to whether the statutory ceilings for high-cost areas generally can also be so raised for these three places. This section would make it clear that this can be done. Thus, the $10,000 mortgage limit for high-cost areas in section 221 (housing for displaced families) could be increased up to $15,000 in Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii.

Section 110. Repeal of obsolete provision: This section would repeal section 218 of the National Housing Act. Section 218 permitted fees for applications filed prior to March 1, 1950, with respect to the expired veterans' rental housing program under section 608 of that act to be transferred, in the case of unexpired section 608 commitments, to applications under FHA's regular rental housing program. There are no section 608 commitments outstanding so that section 218 is now completely without effect.

Section 111. Housing in urban renewal areas: FHA experience in the urban renewal program since the Housing Act of 1954 indicates the desirability of certain modifications to section 220 of the National Housing Act which authorizes special mortgage insurance assistance for both sales and rental housing in urban renewal areas. Section 111 of the bill would amend section 220 to increase the maximum mortgage amounts for one- and two-family residences to $25,000. This change would place the section 220 program on a par with the increases proposed elsewhere in the bill for the regular FHA sales housing program under section 203 of the act.

For properties with 3 to 11 units, the maximum mortgage amount would be left to the Commissioner's discretion. The elimination of a statutory dollar mortgage limitation for these properties is recommended in recognition of the wide variety of types and qualities of properties in this size range which might be encountered in urban renewal areas. The statutory mortgage limitations based on the applicable maximum loan-to-value or loan-to-replacement cost formula would still apply to these properties.

A second amendment would provide for mortgages on homes of nonoccupant-owners to be computed under the same loan-value ratios as apply for owner-occupants. However, 15 percent of the outstanding loan proceeds would be required to be held in escrow until sale of the property to an owner-occupant. This amendment would provide the same changes to the section 220 sales housing program as section 104 of the bill would provide for the regular FHA sales housing program under section 203 of the act, thereby facilitating the trading in of existing homes.

In the case of new rental housing in urban renewal areas, a further amendment would eliminate the limitation of mortgage amounts to "90 percent of replacement cost," and substitute therefor the limitation that the mortgage not exceed 100 percent of the estimated replacement cost exclusive of builder's or sponsor's general overhead and profit. Under the present law, the sponsor-redeveloper who is also the builder is able to obtain section 220 insured mortgages which may approximate total project cost, exclusive of overhead and profit to the redeveloper. On the other hand, if a sponsor-redeveloper does not also act as a builder and has to contract with a general contractor for the construction work, the present law is so devised that the available mortgage amount may be 4 to 5 percent less. This kind of sponsor should be enabled to compete for the opportunity to develop urban renewal projects more readily on a basis of equality with builder-sponsors.

The particular feature of the law which gives rise to this discrimination is the flat allowance of 10 percent for builder's profit which (as the legislative history makes clear) must be given on a uniform basis where the redeveloper is also the builder. Investors, who hire a general contractor to construct the building, certify that their actual cost in connection with the construction is the amount which they pay to the general contractor under the building contract. In the case of large projects, this amount generally includes a factor for the contractor's profit of only about 4 percent or 5 percent, rather than 10 percent. As a result, under the cost certification procedure prescribed in section 227 of the National Housing Act, the insured mortgage amount is disproportionately smaller and the cash investment is disproportionately larger than would be the case if the redeveloper had acted as his own builder.

Another form of discrimination which results from the statutory 10 percent builder's profit allowance for section 220 projects militates against rehabilitation projects. Where an old apartment house is purchased and rehabilitated, the major portion of the investment may well relate to the purchase of the existing property, rather than to the reconstruction work. A reasonable allowance for builder's profit in connection with such reconstruction work would frequently be above 10 percent. A higher profit allowance for this type of work as compared with new construction would merely recognize that the percentage allowance is being applied to a smaller total construction-work cost and that it involves a greater degree of risk because of unknown conditions which may be found when the walls of the old building are opened up. Thus, as applied to some rehabilitation projects, the present provisions applicable to the section 220 program, which in effect limit the builder's profit and risk allowances to 10 percent, are less flexible than they should be.

Finally, it should be noted that the present provisions of sections 220 and 227 of the National Housing Act which govern the builder's profit and risk allowance, both with respect to estimated replacement cost and with respect to certified actual cost, are very complicated and difficult to understand. Some distinctions must necessarily be made for new projects and rehabilitation projects and for builder-redevelopers and investor-redevelopers. The various distinctions applicable to the section 220 program which are found both in section 220 and section 227 frequently discourage interest by prospective redevelopers who do not understand them, thereby unduly limiting participation in the program. This is especially true because the entire system of profit and overhead allowances is related, in a complex formula, to a maximum permissible mortgage amount, whereas builders and investors customarily think in terms of necessary cash investment. Accordingly, it is important to simplify these provisions where feasible.

Section 111 of the bill would (1) eliminate the discrimination against investor-redevelopers sponsoring new section 220 rental housing projects; (2) eliminate the discrimination against rehabilitation projects; and (3) simplify the requirements in order that they may be better understood by prospective redevelopers and lenders.

In the case of new projects, the limitation of the mortgage to 90 percent of estimated replacement cost and 90 percent of actual certified cost would be replaced with a limitation that the mortgage shall not exceed the estimated replacement cost or the actual certified cost (whichever is lower), excluding, however, any allowance for builder's general overhead and profit. This exclusion would very well counterbalance the elimination of the 90 percent limitation, so that with respect to new construction by a builder-redeveloper the insured mortgage amount would be almost the same as under present law. However, a higher mortgage amount than under present law would result for an investor-redeveloper, thereby treating the two types of redevelopers more nearly alike. Thus, the change is not intended either to liberalize or restrict mortgage amounts, but only to simplify the requirements applicable to new construction under section 220 and to eliminate a discrimination against investor-redevelopers.

In the case of rehabilitation projects, the maximum mortgage amount would, as under present law, be limited to 90 percent of estimated value and 90 percent of actual cost, whichever is lower. However, the builder's profit allowance for cost certification purposes would no longer be limited to 10 percent of the reconstruction work, thereby permitting a more liberal allowance to be made in appropriate cases. This change would also simplify the law significantly since rehabilitation projects under section 220 would hereafter be governed by the same cost certification procedures as are applicable to FHA's regular rental housing program under section 207. Under these procedures, the builder's profit allowance would be applied to the cost of the reconstruction work, as is done in normal trade practice. It would not be applied to such miscellaneous items as architect's fees which are now specially included only in the section 220 rental housing program. This change, standing alone, tends to reduce the dollar amount of the builder's profit allowance in the case of section 220 rehabilitation projects, but the fact that profit allowances would no longer be limited to 10 percent would permit use of higher allowances more appropriate to rehabilitation work. As a result, the general effect of the entire amendment would be to include more realistic and higher dollar amounts for overhead and profit under the program.

The section would further modify section 220 mortgage limitations in order to exclude from the mortgage amount limitation for dwelling purposes those costs of the project which are required for landscaping and other exterior land improvements. It is particularly important to encourage or make possible such amenities in urban renewal areas because the areas are frequently planned for low land coverage, and also frequently require special upgrading efforts to offset adverse neighborhood influences.

Finally, this section of the bill would make explicit provision in section 220 permitting inclusion in the mortgage amount of community and commercial facilities which are appropriate to the urban renewal operation. It seems certain, in view of the location characteristics of many section 220 projects, that both community and commercial facilities could be an integral part of sound redevelopment. The amendment would merely remove any uncertainties on this matter concerning congressional intent.

Section 112. Urban Renewal Relocation Housing: This section would amend the FHA section 221 program for housing for familes displaced by urban renewal activities or other governmental activities such as highway construction or code enforcement.

The first numbered amendment would merely make it clear that the FHA is not expected to adopt unreasonable or unworkable procedures in order to gear the completion of section 221 units to the timing of the displacement of eligible families. The section 221 program depends entirely on voluntary action by many private builders and lenders. The displacements of families result from local governmental code enforcement actions which are variable in timing and from local urban renewal operations involving both governmental and industry actions. If mortgage insurance aids are postponed in an attempt to gear completion of the housing with any degree of precision to the timing of the expected displacement, the result may very well be that the housing will never be built, or that scheduling will be on a stop-and-go basis involving an inefficient and costly construction process.

The second numbered amendment would increase the sales housing mortgage limit for relocation housing in high-cost areas from $10,000 to $12,000 per family unit. The present $9,000 limit in normal areas would not be changed. This increase would make the section 221 sales housing program more workable in high-cost areas, particularly in some large cities. Without this amendment, the program in some localities would be virtually limited to existing houses. The amendment would make the relation of the ceiling for high-cost areas and the ceiling for other areas more readily correspond to the differences in construction costs and family incomes in the two types of areas.

The third numbered amendment would provide for basing mortgage amounts on estimates of replacement cost for section 221 new rental projects. Because of the close relationship between section 221 and section 220, it is desirable that the same basis for determining mortgage amounts for multifamily projects be used in both programs, namely, replacement cost rather than appraised value for new construction. (In both cases, appraised value would of course be used for existing construction or rehabilitation projects.) Also, for new projects operated on a nonprofit basis, application of valuation procedures is unnecessarily unwieldy and sometimes an ineffective method of arriving at satisfactory maximum insurable mortgages. In contrast, determination of replacement cost is both direct and consistent with the objectives of the program.

The fourth and seventh numbered amendments would authorize profit-motive development of rental projects in either new construction or rehabilitation operations under section 221.

Mortgage amounts for such projects would be limited to 90 percent of value in the case of existing construction or, in the case of new construction, to the estimated replacement cost, exclusive of builder's and sponsor's overhead and profit. Cost certification procedures would apply in order to preclude cash profits from construction coming from the proceeds of the mortgage. These provisions are consistent with the proposed section 220 rental housing changes explained in detail in connection with the preceding section of this bill.

In many cases, this authorization for profit-motive development of section 221 rental housing would greatly assist in relocating displaced families. Relocation is one of the most difficult and urgent problems in the whole urban renewal program. The Government has a responsibility to these families forced from their homes. It is estimated that in 3 years 83,000 families will be displaced from urban renewal areas, and 247,000 families will be displaced as a result of all Government programs, including the urban renewal and highway programs. (See table A below.) On the basis of urban renewal experience, a high percentage of displaced families, because of family income or other factors, will want to rent dwelling units, rather than buy homes.

Present FHA insurance programs are inadequate to provide the needed rental housing which could be built under the proposal. Only a few projects by nonprofit corporations have reached the FHA commitment stage, and it was never anticipated that nonprofit corporations would produce more than a limited amount of rental housing. Other FHA rental housing programs were not designed for displaced families, and do not have the programing and occupancy priority provisions for these families which are contained in section 221. Section 220 urban renewal housing is not geared specifically to meet their needs, and must be built in urban renewal areas where the land costs are often very high, particularly in central city locations. Section 221 housing is not limited to urban renewal areas, so that builders could acquire land in other areas more appropriate for rental housing to be occupied by families of low or moderate income.

The liberal mortgage insurance terms of the proposal should give adequate incentive for the production of the rental housing to be programed under section 221. The housing would be programed only where it is determined that prospective rentals would be within the range of the incomes of the displaced families to be served. A large portion of the displaced families wishing private rental accommodations would still have to move into existing private structures. However, the proposed rental program could meet a critical segment of the relocation need not met by public housing. In this connection, it may be noted that the proposal would apply to rehabilitation as well as new construction. Rehabilitation would produce lower rentals and thus reach a broader segment of displaced families.

The proposal is essentially a change in the existing FHA insurance program for displaced families to permit a substantial amount of rental housing to be assisted, in addition to the assistance now being furnished to sales housing. This simply conforms to the needs of these families, and helps solve the relocation problem of cities undertaking urban renewal.

TABLE A.—3-year (fiscal 1958, 1959, and 1980) estimate of families to be displaced by Government action

Type of displacement:	Number of families [1]
Urban renewal (title I)	83,000
Highway programs	[2] 75,000
Other governmental activity [3]	89,000
Total	247,000

[1] Includes estimated number of single-person households of elderly individuals (65 years of age and over).

[2] Estimate of 70,000 furnished by the Bureau of Public Roads and adjusted to include elderly single-person households.

[3] Such as public construction, code enforcement, eviction of over-income tenants in public housing, demolition of temporary housing, etc.

The fifth numbered amendment would change from 10 to 12 the minimum number of units required in section 221 rental projects for displaced families. This is consistent with provisions in the preceding section relating to the section 220 program for rental housing in urban renewal areas.

The sixth numbered amendment would make it clear that commercial and community facilities could be included in rental housing mortgages insured under section 221.

Section 113. Cost certification—amendments required for consistency with other sections. This section would amend section 227 of the National Housing Act, dealing with cost certification by mortgagors of FHA-aided rental housing projects.

The substantive changes in the first numbered amendment are required for the purpose of subjecting to the requirements of cost certification elderly persons rental projects insured under the proposed new section 230 of the National Housing Act and projects insured under the proposed new section 221 provisions for profit-motivated rental housing. Section 227 would also be perfected technically by omitting obsolete references.

The change in the second numbered amendment is required in order to make section 227 consistent with the proposed revisions to sections 220 and 221 permitting mortgages on new construction to equal the replacement cost exclusive of any allowance for builder's and sponsor's general overhead and profit.

Section 114. Voluntary termination of mortgage insurance contracts: This section would permit termination of mortgage insurance under all FHA mortgage-insurance programs by mutual agreement between mortgagee and mortgagor without the present necessity of paying off the mortgage. Such necessity arises under the present wording of sections 204(j), 207(n) and similar provisions of the National Housing Act. Where the required payment in full involves a refinancing transaction, a financial burden is imposed upon the mortgagor for title search and drawing legal documents. This section of the bill would relieve the mortgagor of the necessity for these avoidable expenses of refinancing if the purpose is only to terminate insurance. This proposal is consistent with limiting FHA assistance to elements of risk which the private market cannot assume.

In order that the financial position of the FHA insurance funds will not be materially affected by this change, the same provision for an adjusted premium charge is made in the case of insurance termination under the proposed new provision as is presently provided for in the case of prepayment terminations. Rights and privileges under the insurance, such as the privilege of mortgagors to receive distributive shares from the Mutual Mortgage Insurance Fund, would be the same in the case of insurance termination under the new provision as is now provided for in the case of prepayment terminations.

Section 115. Rental housing for the elderly: This section would add a new section 230 to the National Housing Act which would cover both the program of nonprofit rental housing for the elderly now covered by section 207 of the act and a proposed new program for profit development of rental projects for the elderly. New construction and rehabilitation would be eligible in both programs.

The provisions governing nonprofit projects would also be changed in several respects. They would not require the FHA to establish rental ceilings. These ceilings have served no practical purpose in this program because all the projects are owned and operated by nonprofit organizations. The new section would also omit the requirement that the project be economically sound. This requirement is not well adapted to projects of special design having a specialized purpose. Instead, the Commissioner would, in administering the program, approve mortgage insurance applications on the basis of acceptable risk after taking into consideration the need for providing adequate housing for elderly persons.

The term "family unit" which now occurs in section 207 of the National Housing Act continues to create some misunderstanding with respect to housing accommodations for the elderly which may need only half baths or may not need individual cooking facilities. Section 110 of the Housing Act of 1957 removed basic difficulties relating to this matter but, although it referred to occupancy by single persons, it did not eliminate the misleading reference to family unit. The new section refers to a living unit, rather than to a family unit, thereby clarifying the law and encouraging greater flexibility in design.

In some areas of the country, construction costs are too high to permit rental housing projects for the elderly to be provided under the present mortgage ceilings of $8,100 per unit and $8,400 for elevator structures. Accordingly, the new section would apply to rental housing for the elderly the same high-cost area provisions as are now applicable to FHA's regular rental housing program. That is, in high-cost areas, the $8,100 and $8,400 per unit ceilings could be increased by not to exceed $1,000 for each room.

Because the nonprofit organizations which participate in the program may be the recipients of labor and services, as well as materials, at reduced rates or prices, the prevailing wage requirements contained in section 212 of the National Housing Act would not be made applicable to nonprofit projects. This exemption will be particularly helpful in this program because a high proportion of the projects will be developed in smaller communities where determinations of prevailing wages may be unrealistic because of lack of comparable operations in the area.

Finally, the maximum interest rate proposed for the elderly persons rental housing program is 5½ percent, the same rate which another section of this bill would apply to regular FHA-aided rental housing and to management-type cooperative projects.

The provisions governing the proposed new program for profit development of rental projects for the elderly would be the same as those for nonprofit projects except in a number of particulars. Requirements as to special design, the absence of an "economic soundness" requirement, dollar limitations per living unit, the cost certification requirement, and the 5½ percent interest rate ceiling would apply to both programs. In the case of profit-motivated projects, the maximum mortgage amount would be 90 percent of the Commissioner's estimate of value, rather than of replacement cost. Also, prevailing wage requirements would be applicable, and provision is made to enable the Commissioner to control rents and charges as in other rental projects.

Section 116. Certain legal notifications authorized to be sent by mail: Section 512 of the National Housing Act authorizes the denial of benefits of participation in FHA insurance programs to persons or firms who knowingly violate that act or related laws or regulations. Section 512 requires the Commissioner, before determining that there has been such a violation, to notify the affected person or firm in writing that such a determination is proposed. This section of the bill would provide that the notification shall be legally sufficient if it is properly sent by mail to the last known address of the person or firm. This change is necessary for some jurisdictions where the Commissioner is, in effect, precluded from making final determinations against violators who cannot be reached because their new address is unknown.

Section 117. Extension of armed services housing mortgage insurance program: Section 803 of the National Housing Act, which authorizes the program of mortgage insurance for rental housing at military installations, would be amended by this section to provide for a 1-year extension of the program, from June 30, 1959, to June 30, 1960. Four additional amendments to title VIII would be made. First, the statutory ceiling on interest rates would be raised from 4½ to 5½ percent, consistent with the change proposed for sections 207 and 213. Second, maximum maturity would be increased from 25 to 30 years, thereby reducing the monthly carrying charges. Third, with respect to Wherry Act projects acquired by the Defense Department, the FHA Commissioner would be given the same authority to reduce insurance premiums below one-half of 1 percent per annum as the statute provides with respect to projects financed under the armed services rental housing program enacted in 1955. Fourth, explicit provision would be made for insured mortgage financing of nondwelling facilities adequate to serve the occupants of the property—comparable to the authority in FHA's regular rental housing program under section 207.

TITLE II—FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION

Section 201. Increased dollar limit for mortgages purchased under secondary market operations: This section would increase the limit on the amount of a mortgage which may be purchased by FNMA under its secondary market operations from $15,000 for each family residence or dwelling unit covered by the mortgage to $20,000. The $15,000 limit would remain applicable to mortgages purchased under the special assistance functions. As under present law, no dollar limit would apply to armed services housing mortgages insured under section 803 of the National Housing Act or to mortgages covering property located in Alaska, Guam, or Hawaii.

The section would make possible assistance through the secondary market operations to housing serving additional families of moderate income, particularly larger families. Although the bulk of purchases by FNMA under its secondary market operations has been, and will continue to be, of mortgages on lower priced homes (the average mortgage now being purchased is about $11,500), the $15,000 limitation has materially interfered with FNMA's rendering the services originally intended.

The prices of new houses have substantially increased since 1954 when the ceiling of $15,000 was established. The median selling price of new homes has risen from $12,300 in 1954 to an estimated $14,300. This means that for one-half of the homes, sales prices are above that figure. Moreover, in high-cost areas in and around large cities, the median price would be higher than for the country as a whole, including a large proportion of new homes priced above $15,000. The increase in the price of houses, coupled with recent lower downpayment requirements (that result in mortgages in larger dollar amounts), has very substantially reduced the sector of the market for VA-guaranteed and FHA-insured mortgages that FNMA is able to serve. Clearly, if FNMA's secondary market function is to continue to serve a fair cross section of moderate income families, including larger families and those in higher cost areas, the limit on the amount of a mortgage that it can purchase should not be subject to a $15,000 ceiling.

Section 202. Purchase prices, fees, and charges under special assistance functions: This section would restore to section 305(b) of FNMA's corporate charter the original language provided by the 1954 FNMA Charter Act: FNMA would have discretion under its special assistance functions to determine not only purchase prices but also fees and charges. Although the pricing provision now found in section 305(b) expired on August 7, 1958, the law still limits FNMA's fees for its special assistance services to a maximum of 1½ percent, and specifies that not more than half of such fees may be collected at the time of commitment.

While FNMA's special assistance functions are financed only with Treasury supplied money, the FNMA Charter Act states that fees shall be imposed with the objective that the functions be fully self-supporting. The present statutory controls on fees and charges are hardly compatible with that objective. The amendment would put back the language originally provided in 1954 to accommodate the foregoing objective of the law. As indicated above, it would also restore other original provisions, replacing the purchase price provision that expired in August 1958.

The special assistance functions were designed to supplement and encourage private investment in special categories of home mortgages. There was no intention that they should supplant such investment. Statutory controls on purchase prices and on fees and charges have made it difficult, and sometimes impossible, for private investors to compete in the purchase of even the more desirable of the mortgages eligible for FNMA's special assistance. Since the great preponderance of mortgage financing money in this country comes from private sources, it is clear that, in the long run, more funds will become available for the categories of mortgages designated for special assistance if FNMA's special assistance functions can be administered so that private capital will be actively encouraged to invest in, and become familiar with, these types of mortgages.

Section 203. Authority to invest excess funds: This section would amend the Association's corporate charter so as to permit some increased latitude in the investment of funds that, from time to time, may temporarily be in excess of current operating needs. Funds arising from sales of mortgages, for example, should be employed gainfully and, to the extent practicable, to offset the cost to FNMA of operating funds borrowed from private sources. Investments are now restricted to Government and Government-guaranteed obligations, with repect to which the investment yield may often be wholly inadequate to offset to any appreciable degree such cost to FNMA of its borrowed operating funds.

The amendment would authorize FNMA to invest "in obligations of the United States or guaranteed thereby, or in obligations which are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds." The immediate purpose of the proposal is to qualify for temporary investment by FNMA the so-called Federal agency obligations of which Federal intermediate credit bank debentures and Federal home loan bank notes are typical. They carry very high investment ratings—second only to United States Government obligations. Although they enjoy a high degree of marketability FNMA would generally acquire only obligations having an early maturity conforming with the time when the funds will be needed for mortgage purchasing or other corporate operating requirements. These types of obligations usually afford a higher return than Government securities of comparable term.

Section 204. Transfer of mortgages to FNMA: The immediate purpose of this section is to make it possible for the Public Housing Administration to be relieved of, and for FNMA to assume, the ownership, servicing, and sale of certain mortgages and other obligations acquired or to be acquired by the PHA in connection with the liquidation of various Government housing programs. The bulk of such mortgages resulted from the sale of Lanham Act projects that were constructed to provide housing for persons engaged in World War II national defense activities. It is more practical to transfer the mortgages to FNMA, which has nationwide mortgage servicing facilities already established, than to attempt to maintain comparable facilities in PHA. Provision is also made to permit such transfers by other Housing Agency constituents in similar circumstances if the need arises.

With respect to any mortgages acquired by the FNMA under this section, the FNMA would assume only those duties and functions which arise under the FNMA Charter Act or the mortgage instruments themselves. Thus, the PHA would retain all remaining functions under the Lanham Act respecting the liquidation of properties securing the mortgages to be transferred to FNMA. For example, the PHA would complete pending land condemnation proceedings; handle complaints and inquiries (and assist the Department of Justice in handling litigation) relating to the development and sale of the housing projects; and carry out other liquidating responsibilities arising from the former Federal ownership of the properties rather than from the mortgage instruments.

TITLE III—URBAN RENEWAL

Section 301. Encouragement of State-local public agencies: This section would direct the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to particularly encourage the utilization of State agencies to operate on a statewide basis in behalf of smaller communities within the State whenever that arrangement provides an effective solution to community development or redevelopment problems in the communities. They would act as urban renewal agencies for the smaller communities. The arrangement would have to be approved by resolution or ordinance of the governing bodies of the affected communities.

The existing law provides sufficient authority for the Administrator to contract with State agencies for assistance to urban renewal projects. The proposed amendment would give explicit recognition to the desirability of more State responsibility and participation in urban renewal. It would also enable many small communities to have urban renewal programs which could not afford to undertake effective programs alone.

Section 302. Technical amendment on certain financing authority: This section is a technical amendment to avoid a possible misinterpretation of statutory language affecting certain private financing for an urban renewal project. Where a local public agency enters into long-term leases of the land in an urban renewal project, the URA enters into a long-term or definitive loan agreement with the local agency. This agreement is distinguished from the temporary loan agreement entered into in the usual cases where the land is sold and the loan is repaid within a short time. In all cases the local agency issues obligations on the private market, wherever feasible, pledging the loan agreement with the Federal Government. Because of existing statutory language, certain bond counsel has expressed some doubt as to whether a definitive loan agreement of the Federal Government can be used as a pledge to cover the interest, as well as the principal, on the long-term obligations sold on the private market. This doubt is expressed because the second sentence of section 102(a) of the Housing Act of 1949 provides that the loan agreement of the Federal Government shall be in an amount not exceeding the estimated expenditures to be made by the local public agency "as part of the gross project cost." The term "gross project cost" is defined in section 110(e) of that act as the sum of the actual expenditures of the local public agency necessary to the project undertaking and the amount of noncash local grants-in-aid made in connection with the project. It is contended that therefore the loan agreement must not only be within the amount of these expenditures and grants-in-aid work but that it may be used only for them. Under this possible interpretation, the loan agreement could not be used in any case as a pledge for interest payments on a private obligation, as they are not part of gross project cost.

The Housing Agency does not construe section 102(a) in the above manner but follows the generally accepted view that the pertinent language in that section limits the amount of the Government loan agreement and not its purpose. However, it is desirable to remove the possibility of any misinterpretation by bond counsel which could hinder financing. Accordingly, this section of the bill would preclude any interpretation that such language limits the purpose of the loan agreement. This would be accomplished by striking out the above words "as part of the gross project cost" and substituting "for such purposes."

Section 303. Urban renewal loan authorization: This section would resolve certain technical difficulties which would become a serious obstacle to the temporary financing of urban renewal projects under existing law.

The Housing Administrator enters into contracts to make advances and loans for the planning and carrying out of urban renewal projects. This temporary financing is ultimately retired by proceeds of land sales, local and Federal cash grants, and (where project land is disposed of by lease rather than sale) by long-term loans referred to as "definitive loans." To obtain funds to make advances and loans, the Administrator is authorized to issue and have outstanding to the Secretary of the Treasury at any one time notes and other obligations in an amount not to exceed $1 billion.

In order that an urban renewal project may have an assured source of funds, the initial Federal loan commitment is made in an amount equal to the estimated total expenditures necessary for carrying out the project. Under generally applicable accounting principles and definition, this loan commitment constitutes a charge against the authorized Treasury borrowing authority, since this is the source of funds against which the Administrator must draw if required to make direct loans to the project. The total amount of loan contracts so entered into will exhaust the $1 billion authorization by the end of fiscal year 1959.

Experience has established that the amount actually provided for project financing from Federal funds is only a fraction of the face amount of the loan commitment. This results from the fact that most of the temporary financing actually used by local public agencies for urban renewal projects is obtained by private borrowings, using a pledge of the Federal loan contract as security for the private loan. This arrangement, under normal conditions, involves little or no actual disbursement of Federal funds and hence litle borrowing from the Treasury. Thus, although the statutory authority and procedures are in terms of loans, the actual effect from the standpoint of the Federal Government is that of a guarantee system.

As noted above, loan commitments for urban renewal projects will reach a level of about $1 billion by the end of the current fiscal year. Under present procedures, it would be impossible to enter into further loan contracts for new projects without an increase in the $1 billion borrowing authorization. However, since the Administrator will not normally need to disburse any substantial amount of the loans contracted to be made, he will borrow a correspondingly small amount from the Treasury. The changes which would be made by the amendment are as follows:

1. The limitation on the total amount of loan commitments which may be entered into by the Administrator would be defined as being the aggregate of estimated project expenditures for projects being assisted under title I of the Housing Act of 1949. This is the actual effect of the provisions of the present law, since at present each individual loan contract is limited to the total of estimated project expenditures. At the same time, however, the total amount of loan commitments is limited by the Treasury borrowing authorization, now $1 billion. Under the proposed language loan commitments would be subject only to the single ceiling of estimated total project expenditures, rather than dual ceilings as at present.

2. Obligations incurred against the borrowing authorization would be redefined. Under present law and generally applicable definitions, obligations against the borrowing authority are considered to equal the full amount of loan commitments entered into by the Administrator. Under the proposed amendment such obligations would be defined as equal to the Administrator's estimate of the maximum amounts which would actually be borrowed from the Treasury and outstanding at any one time to satisfy the Administrator's obligations under the loan contracts. This redefinition would make it unnecessary for the Congress to authorize Treasury borrowings in an amount greatly in excess of actual requirements for Federal funds for advances and loans.

3. A clear statement of the intent that project loan financing shall be, to the greatest extent practicable, accomplished by securing funds from non-Federal sources rather than by direct Federal loans would be brought into the statute itself. The present law merely provides that the Administrator may consent to such financing.

Under the language of the proposed section, the President would have the authority to authorize borrowings by the Administrator in excess of $1 billion, should it become necessary in order to carry out the provisions of Federal loan contracts in force. Although very extraordinary conditions would have to prevail before such action could become necessary, the existence of such authority would serve to avoid the delays that conceivably could occur if special action by the Congress were necessary to permit the Administrator to secure funds with which to discharge his obligations. Even though the contingency is remote, this language is considered essential if what is in effect a Federal guarantee of private borrowings is to be fully effective in encouraging private investment at favorable rates in the temporary loan obligations of local public agencies.

The provisions of this section are considered as clarifying and perfecting amendments which facilitate carrying out the plan of financing originally contemplated in the law.

It might also be pointed out that the limit in the law on the amounts of capital grants (rather than on loans) which can be made by the Administrator to urban renewal projects is the limit by which Congress has in effect controlled the size and extent of the urban renewal program. Of course, this method of control would not be changed by this section.

Section 304. Gradual reduction of Federal share of net project cost: Subsection (a) of this section would provide for gradual reductions in the percentage of net project costs which the Federal capital grants may cover, from two-thirds under the existing law to 50 percent on and after July 1, 1962. There would be no change in the present two-thirds formula until July 1, 1960, and there would be no change in the sharing formula for projects for which planning has already been initiated before the effective date of the act.

The existing statute limits the aggregate capital grants paid with respect to most urban renewal projects to two-thirds of the aggregate net costs of such projects. The remaining one-third of net project costs must be borne by the locality in the form of cash or noncash local grants-in-aid, the latter consisting of such things as land donations and the provision of necessary public improvements and facilities. Under this section of the bill, the Federal Government's two-thirds share would be reduced to 60 percent on July 1, 1960, 55 percent on July 1, 1961, and 50 percent on July 1, 1962, with resulting increases in the local share of project costs bringing such share up to a matching 50 percent.

Projects could continue to be approved on a three-fourths Federal share basis, rather than a two-thirds basis, where authorized under existing law, except that the Housing Administrator would be authorized, when the two-thirds maximum Federal share of net project cost is reduced as described above, to reduce the alternative three-fourths share to an appropriate lesser percentage.

The percentage applicable to the capital grants for a particular project would be the percentage in effect at the time that the project is initiated (normally, the commencement of planning).

Since the proposed amendment would provide for a gradual adjustment of the sharing formula over a 3-year period, localities could more easily make the necessary adjustments in their own financial operations.

In the past few years, applications for Federal capital grants for local urban renewal projects have exceeded the grant authority that has been available to the Agency. It appears certain that this high level of interest will continue for the foreseeable future. This proposal to adjust the sharing of urban renewal costs and place the Federal Government and the localities on an equal basis is intended to produce more urban renewal activity for each Federal dollar expended. With a smaller relative amount of Federal funds going into each project, the number of projects that could be assisted with these funds would be correspondingly increased.

This reduction in the Federal share of net project costs is part of the general fiscal policy of the Government to require greater participation on the part of States and localities in bearing the financial burdens of undertakings having primary local as well as national benefit.

Pooling credits: Subsection (b) of this section would permit the pooling of local contributions in the form of cash and noncash local grants-in-aid between different projects undertaken by a local public agency, regardless of the Federal sharing formula that is applicable in each case.

The existing statute permits localities to pool local grants-in-aid only for projects that are executed on the same Federal-local sharing formula. Pooling enables the local public agency to receive credits for contributions that are in excess of the required local share for one project and apply these credits against the local contribution that is required for another project.

The adoption of this subsection should encourage more localities to adopt the alternative capital grant formula (now three-fourths-one-fourth which in turn would eliminate supervisory services and paperwork that now add to the Government's administrative cost.

The three-fourths-one-fourth sharing formula, which was authorized by the Housing Act of 1957, was proposed as a means of reducing the administrative detail connected with urban renewal projects, without materially changing the dollar amount of net costs paid by either the Federal Government or the locality. Essentially this "alternative capital grant formula" permits a locality to obtain a three-fourths Federal grant instead of a two-thirds grant, if the locality is willing to assume the cost and supervision of planning, legal services and administrative overhead. The alternative formula is entirely optional with a locality, and consequently it will be adopted only where the locality can see advantages in doing so.

There has been increasing interest shown by localities in the alternative formula, but in some cases the existing law with respect to pooling credits serves to place a community adopting the alternative formula at a disadvantage. This occurs when the locality has substantial credits built up from local grants-in-aid to projects that are administered in the two-thirds–one-third or usual, sharing formula. If such a locality were to adopt the alternative formula, these credits could not be applied against the net project cost of projects administered under the alternative formula, and the credits would be lost to the locality. The proposed amendment would eliminate this disadvantage in converting to the alternative formula.

Section 305. New grant authorization: Subsection (a) of this section would increase the amounts of obligational authority available to the Administrator for capital grants to urban renewal projects. The amount of the present authorization would be increased by this subsection by $250 million on July 1 of each of the years 1959, 1960, and 1961 and by $200 million on July 1 of each of the years 1962, 1963, and 1964. The increases would provide for a 6-year program of capital grants to urban renewal projects and, in addition, provide obligational authority for grants authorized in later sections of the bill for community renewal programs and for surveys and planning of urban renewal projects.

The provision of a 6-year program of capital grant authorizations, sufficient to maintain a consistent level of program activity, would provide localities with the assurance of continued support for the program by the Federal Government, and would permit them to plan their local programs in the knowledge of a clear statutory statement of the level of Federal participation.

The level of new grant authority which would be provided by this section is correlated to the reduction in the Federal share of project costs, as proposed in the preceding section. In each of the first 3 years, when the Federal share is gradually declining, the level of new authorizations would remain at $250 million a year. In the 3 years after fiscal year 1962, when the Federal share has been set permanently at 50 percent, the level of new authorizations would drop to $200 million a year. Thus the total program in these later years, including both Federal and local contributions, would correspond in size to the total program that would be funded in the first year, when $250 million would be available for Federal grants meeting two-thirds of the net costs of the projects or planning assisted.

The following table indicates the level of grant authority, and the applicable Federal share of costs, which would prevail in each of the 6 years:

Fiscal year	Federal share of costs	New grant authority
	Percent	Millions
1960	66⅔	$250
1961	60	250
1962	55	250
1963	50	200

A portion of the new grant authority in each year would be used for grants to assist localities in preparing community renewal programs, and in making surveys and plans for urban renewal projects. This represents a relatively small amount, however, and almost all of the new grant authority would be available for capital grants to help meet net project costs.

Even so, the level of Federal grants proposed in this subsection is not expected to meet the total amount that may be requested by localities. However, the level of Federal grants for urban renewal must be determined by the relative needs of all the programs that require Federal funds, including programs that serve the national defense. The amount of new grant authority provided in this subsection represents the Administration's best judgment as to the maximum that can be provided for the urban renewal program, in view of all other demands on the Federal budget.

Steps have already been taken under existing law to meet the situation wherein local applications may be expected to exceed the available capital grant authority. Since the beginning of the current fiscal year, applicants have been dealt with under a limitation formula, instead of on the first-come, first-served basis that formerly prevailed.

Repayment of uncollectible advances: Subsection (b) of this section relates to the repayment of uncollectible advances. To obtain funds for advances made to local public agencies for urban renewal planning, the Administrator issues notes to the Secretary of the Treasury. The advances to a local public agency are repayable from moneys becoming available to it for the undertaking of urban renewal projects. However, in some cases the planning work is not completed or projects are not undertaken, and the repayment of such advances become uncollectible. In such cases, this section of the bill would authorize the use of appropriated grant funds for repaying to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to such advances, plus interest attributable to such advances paid or accrued to the Secretary. This procedure would avoid continuing interest charges on the Administrator's notes to the Secretary of the Treasury.

This subsection would not affect the obligations of the local public agency to the Federal Government. If funds should become available at some future time in connection with one of the projects involved, the local agency would remain obligated to pay the Federal Government the amount of the advances with interest in connection with that project.

Section 306. Grants for community renewal programs: Subsection (a) of this section would authorize Federal grants for a share of the costs of preparing community renewal programs.

Such programs would identify and measure slums and blighted areas in a community, would evaluate the financial and other resources needed and available to improve such areas, and would schedule urban renewal projects and activities to be undertaken in the community. Approval of the local governing body would be a prerequisite to any contract for this type of planning grant. Community renewal programs would also provide a framework for public improvements and facilities designed to serve urban renewal areas.

The grants could cover up to two-thirds of the cost of the planning work for which they would be made under planning grant contracts executed before July 1, 1960. On that date the Federal share of the costs would drop to 60 percent; on July 1, 1961, to 55 percent; and on July 1, 1962, to 50 percent. This gradual reduction of the Federal share would parallel the reduction proposed elsewhere in the bill for project capital grants.

It is contemplated that the Federal grants to assist the preparation of community renewal programs would enable a locality to approach the problem of blight on a citywide basis. The deteriorated and deteriorating areas of the city could be identified, and classified as to the relative urgency and degree of urban renewal action that is needed. Then the total need for urban renewal could be related to the locality's total resources for relocation and financing, and to the rate at which the community can utilize cleared land. When the relationship between needs and resources is known, a program of action could be developed, with priorities and schedules for various types of activity. Where federally assisted projects are called for, the detailed survey and planning work would then be carried out under separate contracts.

Such a program would be related to the general plan for the city or the metropolitan area, and to the locality's overall programs for capital improvements and new development. The community renewal program would not replace any of the present functions of general city planning. It would, however, provide a framework for the scheduling of specific public improvements and facilities, which are contemplated as noncash grants-in-aid to help meet the locality's share of urban renewal project costs.

No locality would be required to prepare a community renewal program, but it is anticipated that many communities will want to follow this approach to urban renewal. The need for an analysis of this type has already been recognized in a number of cities. More and more, localities are questioning the wisdom of a project-by-project approach, and attempting to measure their total need for urban renewal against their total capacity to meet that need over a period of years. When a locality has thus appraised its needs and its resources, it can program all of its urban renewal activities in the way that will make best use of the Federal and local funds at its disposal. A balance can be struck between the necessary, but expensive, use of clearance, and the less costly techniques of rehabilitation and conservation, both with and without Government assistance.

The preparation of community renewal programs would have important advantages for the Federal Government as well. It would result in projects that are carefully selected for the most efficient use of Federal funds. By relating the localities' project activities to their capacities for relocation, financing, and the marketing of land, it would space their projects—and hence the demand for capital grant reservations—more evenly over a period of years. Finally, a number of such programs taken in the aggregate would constitute a basis for defining more accurately the national need for urban renewal, and fill the need for data on which both the Congress and the Housing Agency could base long-range determinations as to the size and nature of the Federal program. At present, there exists no adequate information on which to base such determinations.

By its nature, the provision for community renewal programs would eliminate the need for two of the three types of planning that are assisted under the existing law: The feasibility survey and the general neighborhood renewal plan. The feasibility survey was designed to analyze an area for its susceptibility to urban renewal treatment. Since the community renewal program would serve this same function, the provision of assistance for feasibility surveys would be eliminated immediately by this subsection. The community renewal program would also eliminate the need for general neighborhood renewal plans, because it would serve the same function on a communitywide basis, without the necessity of a number of separate applications for Federal assistance. However, some localities will need to revise their planning budgets or their administrative practices in order to shift from the use of advances for general neighborhood renewal plans to the use of grants for community renewal plans. Consequently, the former would not be eliminated by the bill until June 30, 1960.

This subsection would also make technical changes reflecting the substitution (as provided in the next section of this bill) of project planning grants for project planning advances.

Public improvements in community renewal programs made eligible as local grants-in-aid prior to contracts for urban renewal projects: Subsection (b) of this section would provide that, in a community which has an approved community renewal program, public improvements and facilities would not be ineligible for credit as local noncash grants-in-aid to an urban renewal project simply because they were commenced prior to the undertaking of the project. Credit could be obtained for improvements and facilities that are otherwise eligible, if the project they would serve is in conformity with the community renewal program, and if construction is started no more than 5 years prior to the authorization by the Administrator of a contract for loan or capital grant for the project. Under a community renewal program it would be possible, therefore, to obtain credit for public improvements in areas that are slated for federally assisted urban renewal treatment, even though the actual project activities are still several years off.

Authorizations and appropriations for grants: Subsection (c) would broaden the obligational authority in title I of the Housing Act of 1949, which is presently limited to capital grants for urban renewal projects, to include not only capital grants but also all other grants authorized by that title for urban renewal purposes. The authorization for appropriations for the payment of capital grants would also be broadened to be made applicable to all grants, rather than capital grants only. These amendments would therefore provide obligational authority and authorization for appropriations of funds for the Federal grants authorized by this section, and for the Federal grants authorized by other sections of the bill for a share of the costs of planning urban renewal.

Section 307. Grants in place of advances for surveys and planning: Subsection (a) of this section would enact new provisions which, effective July 1, 1960, would substitute grants for advances for assistance to localities in the making of surveys and plans for urban renewal projects. Effective July 1, 1960, the Administrator would be authorized to make planning grants for such surveys and plans. These planning grants could be expended for the same type of planning work in preparation of urban renewal projects as is now financed by advances of funds for such planning, and the same approval by the local governing body would be required.

These grants could cover up to 60 percent of the cost of the planning work for which they would be made under grant contracts executed before July 1, 1961. On that date the Federal share of the planning costs would drop to 55 percent; and on July 1, 1962, to 50 percent. This gradual reduction of the Federal share would parallel the reduction proposed elsewhere in the bill for project capital grants.

This proposal would revise the method by which the Federal Government assists localities in the planning of urban renewal projects, so that the locality and the Federal Government would share the planning costs from the beginning, instead of at the completion of the project. Under the proposed system, the Federal planning advance would be replaced by a direct grant to cover the Federal share of survey and planning costs, with the locality simultaneously providing cash or services to meet its share.

Under the present system, the Federal Government advances all of the money needed to meet all the expenditures during the survey and planning period. These expenditures are added to the costs of executing the project, and are ultimately repaid from grants provided by the locality and the Federal Government to the ensuing project. Consequently, the ultimate cost to the locality would be no greater as a result of substituting a planning grant for a planning advance.

The shift from planning advances to planning grants would not be effective until July 1, 1960. This would permit the localities to make the necessary adjustments in their budgets, so that the local programs would not be hampered or retarded by the requirement that local contributions be made during the planning stage.

When the shift from advances to grants has taken place, the principal effect would be to increase local responsibility during the planning stage. With local funds involved in a project from the beginning, the locality should have greater concern for the elimination of waste, inefficiency and delay. This should result in less Federal supervision of project planning expenditures, and enable the Urban Renewal Administration to simplify procedures and reduce paperwork.

In addition, the provision of local contributions in the planning stage would result in more careful local evaluation of the advisability of undertaking a project. There would be fewer cases where a project enters the planning stage without the local interest and support necessary to carry the project into execution. Under the present law, the repayment of the planning advance becomes uncollectible in such cases, and the Federal Government bears the entire amount of the loss. In addition, any capital grant funds that are reserved for such projects are unavailable for other projects until the planning advance is officially terminated. The proposed subsection would tend to reduce the amount of capital grant funds that are unnecessarily tied up in this fashion.

If the proposed system of planning grants were adopted, the amount of money required from the locality during the planning stage would be relatively small. A one-third share of planning advances made by the agency in the past would have ranged from a median of about $30,000 in cities of more than 1 million population, to a median of about $10,000 in cities of less than 10,000. Under the provisions of the proposed amendment, this amount would not have to be supplied in cash. The local public agency could simply apply salaries and other expenses already budgeted by the locality.

The adoption of this section of the bill would not affect a locality's option to use the alternative three-fourths–one-fourth grant formula, under which it can obtain a larger capital grant by undertaking to pay not only the planning costs but also most of the cost of administering a project in the execution stage.

Technical amendments: Subsection (b) would make technical amendments, effective on July 1, 1960, which are necessary because of the substitution of grants for advances for project planning.

Additional advances after July 1, 1960: Subsection (c) of this section would authorize the Administrator, notwithstanding the above provisions, to amend any contract for advance entered into before July 1, 1960. The amendments could provide for additional advances under the contract or provide for any other changes necessary to the completion of the survey and planning work covered by the contract.

Section 308. Acquisition by Federal agencies: This section would provide clear authority for a Federal agency or the District of Columbia to agree to the statutory requirements applicable to redevelopers when such agencies purchase urban renewal land. Under the Housing Act of 1949 (sec. 105(b)), every purchaser of urban renewal property from a local public agency must agree (1) to devote the property to the uses specified in the urban renewal plan, (2) to begin within a reasonable time any improvement of the property required by the plan, and (3) to comply with such other conditions as the Housing Administrator specifies are necessary to carry out the purposes of the law.

Questions as to the ability of Federal agencies to agree to the restrictions placed on purchasers of urban renewal project land have placed obstacles in the way of land disposition in projects in Washington, D.C., and Sacramento, Calif. Numerous other localities may be affected in the years to come, as more and more projects reach the stage of land disposition.

It would be undesirable to exempt Federal agencies from the restrictions that apply to other redevelopers, because such restrictions are indispensable to the achievement of the objectives of an urban renewal plan.

The proposed technical amendment would provide clear statutory authority for the District of Columbia and Federal agencies to assume the obligations required of all redevelopers, except that the obligation "to begin within a reasonable time any improvement of the property required by the plan" would be applicable only to the extent that the acquiring agency is authorized to proceed with construction and has funds available for that purpose.

Section 309. Removal of limitation on total loans in any State: This section would remove a provision now in the law under which no more than 12½ percent of the Federal funds provided for urban renewal assistance in the form of loans can be expended in any one State. The existing limitation on the amount of grant funds which can be expended in any one State would not be changed by this section.

Under existing law, the State limitation on loan funds could sharply limit the amount of urban renewal activity that can be undertaken in one or more jurisdictions, where the total of title I loan commitments is rapidly approaching the 12½ percent limit of existing borrowing authority.

This could occur in spite of the fact that the jurisdiction concerned may be well within the statutory limitation on capital grant funds. The law establishes the same basic limit of 12½ percent for grant funds that may be spent in any one State, but this limit may be exceeded by up to $100 million for States where more than two-thirds of the maximum permitted under the percentage limit has been committed. In addition, the effective dollar limit on capital grant funds for any State has risen every time the total amount of capital grant authority in title I has been increased by Congress. By contrast, the total amount of borrowing authority has remained unchanged since 1949 at $1 billion. In the past, as a result, the effective dollar limit on loans for any State has been outdistanced by the limit on grant funds. Apart from the unnecessary difficulties raised by the 12½ percent State loan limit under existing law, it is not clear how such limit would serve any purpose after the enactment of the provisions of section 303 of this bill with respect to the Administrator's borrowing and lending authority.

In any event, it is the limit on grant funds that ultimately controls the operation of the urban renewal program. The loan funds are of a revolving character and may be used again after they are repaid, while the grant authority represents expenditures in support of the urban renewal effort. Furthermore, capital grant reservations are made for projects at the start of the survey and planning stage, while the amount of loan funds that may be needed to execute a project cannot be estimated until planning has been completed. If, under existing law, a State reaches the limit on loan funds before the limit on grant funds is reached, it means that projects carrying capital grant reservations that are within the limit, and for which Federal approval has been outstanding for several years, might be seriously delayed from going into execution solely because of the limit on lending authority.

Section 310. Simplification of urban renewal plans: This section would give the Housing Administrator authority to permit the simplification of urban renewal plans. Before an urban renewal project can enter the execution stage and the acquisition of land can begin, the urban renewal plan must be approved by the local governing body and reviewed by the Housing Agency. Under existing law, it is mandatory that every urban renewal plan shall (in addition to other requirements) indicate such land acquisition, demolition, and removal of structures, redevelopment, improvements, and rehabilitation as may be proposed to be carried out in the urban renewal area; zoning and planning changes, if any; land uses; maximum densities; and building requirements. This section of the bill would change the law so that these elements of the urban renewal plan would be mandatory only to the extent required by the Housing Administrator for the making of loans and grants for project execution.

This proposal would provide a needed flexibility in the carrying out of urban renewal projects, and help to shorten the time required to complete various project stages. In the planning stage, it would reduce the amount of detail that must be inserted in an urban renewal plan and be approved by the governing body of the locality, before the plan can be submitted to the Agency and a loan and grant contract approved. This would expedite approval of the contract, and permit the project to enter execution at an earlier date.

When a project is in the execution stage, experience has shown that frequent changes have to be made in the urban renewal plan, if each element of the plan has been fixed in every detail in the planning stage. Such details are often revised before an arrangement can be found which is mutually satisfactory to a redeveloper and the local public agency. These changes require amendment of the plan, with the delays that are incurred in obtaining approval of various local agencies, of the local governing body, and of the Housing Agency.

This provision should expedite the execution of projects, by reducing the necessity for changes in the urban renewal plan. It would also permit a simplification of project procedures and documentation, which add to the burden of paperwork. It should have no effect on the number of projects initiated, nor on the ultimate cost of projects either to the locality or to the Federal Government.

Under existing law, it has been possible to simplify some of the administrative requirements that have been imposed on a local public agency when it submits an urban renewal plan for approval of the Agency. Any further simplification would require legislation in the form provided by this section.

Section 311. Loans (without capital grants) for nonresidential projects: Under existing law, urban renewal projects assisted by the Federal Government must normally be predominantly residential, either as to the original site or the redeveloped area. An exception from this requirement permits up to 10 percent of the capital grant authorization to be used for nonresidential projects where the site includes a substantial number of slum or blighted dwellings.

This section of the bill would authorize the Administrator to extend the usual types of financial assistance, other than capital grants, for urban renewal projects which have no residential significance. The section would also authorize the making of refunding loans to refund temporary loans when a project assisted under this section is completed. The refunding loans could be made for a period up to 10 years and in an amount not exceeding the net project cost of the project involved.

A temporary loan made under this authorization would make available to the local public agency the working capital needed to finance the carrying out of urban renewal project activities in the area. The proceeds received from disposition of land in the project area would go to repay all or a portion of the temporary loan. Any remaining portion of the loan could be refunded by the locality with a refunding loan authorized by this section.

The aggregate amount of refunding loans made by the Housing Administrator which could be outstanding at any one time would be limited to $150 million. Local public agencies would be authorized to borrow funds from private sources by pledging certain of their rights under their loan contracts with the Government, thus avoiding the necessity for actual disbursement of loan funds by the Government. Further, the Administrator would be directed to require local public agencies to obtain loan funds from sources other than the Federal Government unless he determines in the particular case that it is not feasible.

This proposal is designed to meet the demand for Federal assistance for urban renewal in areas that do not contain a substantial amount of blighted housing, and are not suitable for redevelopment as new housing sites, but which are nevertheless suffering from urban obsolescence and deterioration. This includes some areas in and around the central business districts, where blight threatens the vitality of the cities' taxable bases, and other commercial and industrial areas that have become outmoded and dilapidated.

The existing law permits 10 percent of the urban renewal capital grant authority to be used for projects which are not predominantly related to housing, but which will bring about the elimination of a substantial amount of residential blight. There has been a growing pressure to provide capital grants also for projects designed for the redevelopment of commercial and industrial areas where little or no housing significance is involved. However, it is the basic purpose of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide capital grants only for projects with a substantial housing significance. If the provisions of the existing law were relaxed to permit the use of large capital grants for purely nonresidential projects, a large increase in capital grant authority would be required, to prevent a comparable decrease in the number of projects with a housing orientation. Consequently, the 10 percent exception provided in section 110(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 should remain unchanged, except that (as provided in another section of this bill) it should be applied to all of the grants provided by the bill, rather than only to capital grants.

The new system of loans proposed in this section would enable localities to undertake urban renewal action in many obsolete or deteriorated commercial and industrial areas where little or no housing is involved. There are three essential tools of urban renewal—the power of eminent domain, the presence of working capital, and the method of meeting writedown costs. The power of eminent domain would be provided by State enabling legislation, and no action by the Federal Government is necessary. The provision of temporary loans would provide the working capital needed in projects of this type. While existing experience and studies are not extensive, there are indications that the power of eminent domain and the provision of working capital may be enough for the renewal of some commercial and industrial areas, where proceeds from the sale of cleared land are sufficient to meet the costs of a project. Where this is not so, the refunding loan would help the locality to amortize the remaining project costs over a period up to 10 years.

Section 312. Credit for carrying charges on local funds: This section would permit the inclusion in gross project cost of an amount in lieu of carrying charges where a community uses its own funds temporarily to finance a project undertaking. While this section has no effect on projects which have been completed and on which financial settlement has been made, it would permit the Administrator to include such an amount in the costs of those projects covered by a Federal aid contract heretofore or hereafter executed for project undertakings. The amount to be included would be based on the net total of all such funds expended and outstanding in all the projects of the local public agency, and would be computed at an interest rate determined by the Administrator after taking into consideration the average rates borne by federally guaranteed obligations of the local public agencies issued on the private market during the preceding 6-month period.

Under existing law, localities which utilize direct Federal loans or Federal loan commitments to obtain working capital for a project may apply the carrying charges on such borrowings to the gross cost of the project, which means that the Federal grant payment is increased by absorbing two-thirds of this cost. Under this amendment localities which utilize their own funds as working capital in cases where the carrying charges on such funds are not readily ascertainable would be placed generally on a par with those localities which, with a Federal guarantee, borrow their working capital on the private market.

To permit this additional charge to gross project cost should eliminate the penalty now suffered by some localities, and encourage other localities to use their own funds for working capital instead of relying on the Federal loan commitment. This would reduce the volume of temporary loan commitments issued by the Agency and help to minimize the need for direct disbursement of Federal loan funds.

In each case, the actual amount of interest that would be eligible as a charge to gross project cost would be calculated by the net amount outstanding at any given time, after subtraction of land sale proceeds and other income to the project, which would reduce the need for funds advanced by the locality. The amendment also provides that the net amount outstanding would be calculated from the combined accounts of all projects in the locality, and allocated to the gross project cost of the separate projects.

Section 313. Uniform date for determining application of going Federal rate to urban renewal contracts: This section would provide a uniform date for the determination of the interest rates in contracts for loans and advances to urban renewal projects. The definition of "going Federal rate" in the Housing Act of 1949 is used as a basis for determining the interest rate on loans and advances for all urban renewal projects, but the existing law inconsistently determines the applicable rate at different times for different types of contracts. One date (date contract is approved by Housing Administrator) is provided for contracts executed after the enactment of the Housing Act of 1954, another date (date contract is made) applies to contracts executed prior thereto, and still a third date (date contract is revised and superseded) is used for amendatory contracts. This section would provide a single uniform date for the determination of the applicable going Federal interest rate. It would fix the date for determining the applicable rate for all contracts as the date the contract, or amendatory contract, is authorized by the Administrator. Such authorization is evidenced by an internal allocation order, which allocates capital grant funds for the particular project. This allocation order would serve as a uniform and convenient date for determining the applicable interest rate. This change is merely technical and would not tend to either increase or decrease aggregate interest payments by localities.

Section 314. Federal recognition: This section of the bill would add a new definition, to title I of the Housing Act of 1949, of the term "Federal recognition." The term would be defined as meaning the execution of any contract for Federal aid under title I or concurrence by the Administrator in the commencement of surveys and plans without Federal financial assistance.

This is a technical amendment made necessary by two other provisions of the bill. One provision would adjust the Federal share of project costs, and the other provision would permit the liberation of noncash grants-in-aid credit requirements in localities with approved community renewal programs. It is important in both cases to define a clearly specified date when Federal recognition is first extended to an urban renewal project.

Section 315. Increase in authorization for urban planning assistance: This section would increase by $10 million the existing authorization of $10 million for appropriations to the Housing Administrator to be used for urban planning assistance grants under section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954.

Under this program matching grants are made to State planning agencies for the provision of assistance in urban planning work to municipalities with populations of less than 25,000. Similar grants are available to official State, metropolitan, or regional planning agencies for planning work in metropolitan and regional areas, and to official governmental planning agencies for areas threatened with rapid urbanization as a result of Federal installations. Grants may also be made for planning assistance in disaster areas.

The demand for urban planning assistance grants continues to grow, and it has been necessary during the current fiscal year to apply a limitation formula to the amount of funds that may be allocated to any one agency. The appropriated funds will nevertheless be exhausted at the end of the fiscal year, and less than $1 million of the present $10 million authorization remains unappropriated.

Recent experience has indicated an annual dollar volume of applications of $4.2 million and the future annual rate is expected to be in the neighborhood of $5 million. For this reason, the bill provides for an additional authorization of $10 million, which would permit the urban planning assistance program to operate for at least 2 years.

Section 316. Investments by banks in long-term obligations of local public agencies: Where a local public agency enters into long-term leases of the land in an urban renewal project, the URA enters into a long-term or definitive loan agreement with the local agency. This agreement is distinguished from the temporary loan agreement entered into in the usual cases where the land is sold and the loan is repaid within a short time. In all cases the local agency issues obligations on the private market, wherever feasible, pledging the loan agreement with the Federal Government. Under the National Bank Act (par. 7, 12 U.S.C. 24) the national banks and (to the extent permitted by State laws) State member banks of the Federal Reserve System are given certain investment privileges with respect to these obligations if they are short term but not if they are long term. Such banks are authorized to purchase or underwrite these obligations having a maturity of not more than 18 months without regard to a general prohibition on any such bank investing for its own account in obligations of any one issuer in excess of 10 percent of the amount of the bank's capital stock and surplus.

This section of the bill would remove the 18-month limitation in the existing law. Thus such banks would be able to purchase and to underwrite both short-term and long-term obligations (including temporary, definitive and refunding loans) of a local public agency issued in connection with an urban renewal project where all installments, when due, of both principal of and interest on such obligations are secured by an unconditional agreement by the Federal Government as now authorized under sections 102(a) and 102(c) of title I of the Housing Act of 1949.

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS

Section 401. Surveys of public works planning: The Housing Administrator is now carrying out a program of advances for the planning of public works pursuant to section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954. Advances are made from a revolving fund established by that section for the program. This section of the bill would authorize the use of up to $50,000 per fiscal year from moneys in the revolving fund for the systematic and continuing collection of information on the current status of State and local public works planning and requirements for such public work. A survey of the status and volume of advance public works planning was undertaken pursuant to authority granted in the Housing Act of 1954, but that survey is now obsolete and no authority exists for additional ones to be made.

Under this section, it is contemplated that the information authorized to be collected would be compiled through representative sampling surveys of the more than 100,000 State and local governments. This would determine the current status and volume of plans for public works and the estimated long-range requirement for public works. This data, not now available, would provide the means for measuring the volume, type, and location of State and local public works plans and the extent to which such governments are meeting or planning to meet the steadily expanding requirements for public facilities, and the extent of the need for such facilities. This would be of assistance in the program of advances for public works planning, and would aid in evaluating applications received from the many local governments for planning advances. This would also provide continuing data for relating Federal public works programs to State and local programs so as to obtain the maximum economic benefits.

Section 402. Disposal of remaining PWA low-rent projects: This section would permit disposal of the few PWA low-rent housing projects still remaining in Federal ownership to other than a local public agency. The existing law directs the PHA to sell its Federal projects or divest itself of their management through leases as soon as practicable, but only to a public housing agency. Forty-seven PWA projects have been sold and only three remain. No sale or lease to a local public agency is possible now in the case of the two projects located in Enid and Oklahoma City, Okla., because there is no enabling State legislation for low-rent public housing, and none seems to be in the offing. Neither has the PHA been able to negotiate a sale or lease with a local public agency in Indianapolis, Ind., and, because of local opposition, it seems unlikely that this can be done in the near future. This section is necessary in order to enable the PHA to sell the three projects on the private market if the three localities still do not wish to take steps to obtain State legislation or municipal approvals which would make local public ownership possible.

Section 403. Consolidation of Lanham Act and other low-rent projects: Lanham Act war-housing projects which have been conveyed to local housing authorities for low-rent use under section 606 of the Lanham Act cannot, under existing law, be consolidated with other low-rent housing projects being assisted with annual contributions under the U.S. Housing Act. This is because that section requires the return of residual receipts each year to the Government, while the U.S. Housing Act provides for the retention of the residual receipts by the local housing authority for reduction of the Federal annual contribution payable under that act. This section of the bill would remove the restriction and permit the commingling of project funds and the use of all residual receipts for reduction of any Federal annual contribution under the consolidated contract. Since the Lanham Act prohibits the payment of annual contributions with respect to any Lanham Act project conveyed for low-rent use, and since all funds and operations would be merged, the amendment to section 606(b) would remove any implication that the payment of an annual contribution to an eligible project under the consolidated contract is a payment with respect to the Lanham Act project.

Section 404. Passyunk war housing projects, Philadelphia, Pa.: This section would extend by 3 years the period during which military personnel may continue to occupy the Passyunk war housing projects, which are presently owned by the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, with occupancy preference and without regard to their income. It would also permit civilians employed in defense activities to continue to occupy the housing during a 3-year period without regard to their income.

These projects were transferred by the Housing and Home Finance Agency to the Philadelphia Housing Authority pursuant to the authorization contained in section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956. Prior to that act, conflicting legislative recommendations had been made to the Congress by the Navy and the local authority, each of which desired permanent control over the projects. This conflict was resolved by the compromise reached in section 406(c), which gave the projects to the local authority but required a 3-year period of preference for military personnel, as determined by the Secretary of Defense, and also permitted the military personnel to remain in occupancy regardless of income. There is need for this existing preference and use of the project to be extended for a 3-year period.

Section 405. Continuation of voluntary home mortgage credit program: This section would continue the voluntary home mortgage credit program for 2 more years. Under the present law the program would terminate on July 31, 1959. The purpose of VHMCP is to facilitate the flow of private funds for FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed home mortgage loans into remote areas and other areas where financing channels are inadequate to facilitate financing of housing including housing open to occupancy by minority groups.

Since the program began full operation in March 1955, over 35,000 FHA and VA loans amounting to approximately $330 million have been placed with private lenders. Over 66 percent of the loans were VA-guaranteed loans and about 23 percent of the total were for homes for minority group families. As a result of the VHMCP, home buyers in small communities and minority groups everywhere have been obtaining mortgage loans in greater quantity, at lower downpayments, with longer maturities, and at lower interest rates than they previously had available to them.

The program is carried on under the National Voluntary Mortgage Credit Extension Committee. This Committee consists of the Housing and Home Finance Administrator as Chairman and representatives of the various industry groups and trade organizations involved in housing and mortgage finance, with advisory members from the Government agencies in the housing field. Regional committees, made up of representatives of the same industry groups and trade associations, supervise activities in their respective regions. Operating through the Committees, the program acts as a clearinghouse to bring together eligible borrowers and lenders. All loans made under the program are made by private lenders with their own investment funds.

Despite adverse mortgage market conditions during a good part of its existence, the VHMCP has provided substantial FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed home financing for veterans and others in rural areas and for minority group members in all types of areas. The VHMCP program was most successful when the interest rate on VA-guaranteed loans was at a competitive market level. If authority permitting adjustment of the interest rate on VA-guaranteed loans to current market levels is enacted, VHMCP would be able to attract a greater volume of private home financing than heretofore in its areas of operation and obviate the need to use Government funds for home loans.

AMENDMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act so as, first, to permit retirement of employees with 30 years of service on full annuities without regard to age: second, to eliminate the requirement that the 5 years used in computing average salary for annuity purposes be consecutive; and, third, to provide for computation of annuities on the basis of 2 percent of average salary.

As the ranking minority member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, where so many Federal employees work, and as a Senator from the State of Maryland, adjacent to the District, where so many Federal employees live, I have a very special interest in our Federal civil service.

The measure which I am introducing combines features designed to bring about a realistic adjustment of benefits for our retired civil service personnel.

The first feature is designed to make it possible for those who work for the Government 30 years to retire and start drawing their retirement payments without waiting for a long period of time, as many of our Federal employees must do under existing legislation. Aside from correcting this injustice, a byproduct of my bill would be to encourage elderly people to retire, thus creating jobs for others.

The second feature of my bill would correct another injustice; it would provide for basing the amount of one's retirement payments on his "best 5 years," without requiring that the 5 years be consecutive, as at present.

The third feature of my bill would provide that retirement payments be computed on the basis of a flat 2 percent of the average salary for the "best 5 years" multiplied by the number of years of service. Under existing law, the computation is complicated and provides slightly smaller payments.

I feel that our Federal employees are entitled to increased benefits. Under the provisions of my bill, none will be overpaid.

We are still in the debt of our Federal employees who have given many years of faithful service.

I urge the committee to which my bill will be referred to take it up without delay and report it early in this session of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 615) to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act so as (1) to permit retirement of employees with 30 years of service on full annuities without regard to age, (2) to eliminate the requirement that the 5 years used in computing average salary for annuity purposes be consecutive, and (3) to provide for computation of annuities on the basis of 2 percent of average salary, introduced by Mr. BEALL, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

APPLICABILITY OF ANTITRUST LAWS TO CERTAIN DESIGNATED PROFESSIONAL TEAM SPORTS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], I introduced a bill granting to professional baseball, football, basketball, and hockey a limited exemption from the antitrust laws.

The bill does not offer a blanket exemption but only those exemptions which have become vital and necessary because of the unique problems facing the professional team sports.

We must recognize, just as the courts have recognized, that their problems are completely different from those confronting other business activities to which our antitrust laws were originally directed.

In my opinion the reserve clause, the territorial limitations, the powers vested in commissioners to preserve the integrity of sports, and football's player selection system, must be preserved if we want professional baseball, football, basketball, and hockey to survive.

This theory is not new or unusual, nor are the provisions of this bill. It provides specified exemptions from the antitrust laws for what might be termed the "sports" aspect of professional athletics while it leaves the business aspects subjected to the antitrust laws.

I ask the Senate to consider the fate of professional team sports in this session and to grant them the statutory relief they must have to exist. I also ask that this bill stay on the desk for 1 week for the addition of cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will remain at the desk as requested by the Senator from Missouri.

The bill (S. 616) to limit the applicability of the antitrust laws so as to exempt certain aspects of designated professional team sports, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself, Mr. DIRKSEN, and Mr. KEATING), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED FOOD STAMP PROGRAM

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to benefit the needy people of this country by utilizing our vast agricultural surpluses. It is intolerable that we allow undernourishment and deprivation to exist among any of our citizens while we have surpluses of food and fibers mounting in the storehouses of the Nation. My proposal embodies the issuance of certificates entitling the needy recipients to supplemental food and fiber products determined to be in surplus. The distribution of the stamps is left to the State organizations and the distribution of the food and fiber is left to private enterprise.

The philosophy of this bill envisages not a Government distribution of surpluses after they have arrived at Government warehouses, but a stimulation of the consumption of abundant products to the point that the accumulation of surpluses by the Government will be narrowed.

Very briefly, this is how the plan would operate. When the Secretary of Agriculture determines that certain products are in oversupply so that our regular commercial channels can no longer absorb them, the State welfare agencies will issue certificates to those who are still in need of aid entitling them to go to their local retail stores and buy these products directly. Ultimately, these certificates will be redeemed by the Department of Agriculture. In this way, our needy will be better cared for. Local small business will be increased, expensive storage for our oversupplies will be reduced.

The administration has voiced general disapproval of all types of so-called food stamp plans, admitting, however, that one such plan with a philosophy similar to this bill did so increase consumption levels when it was operated in 1939–40. I believe that this bill overcomes and overshadows administration objections. The approach taken here would not only improve the health and welfare of the people of the Nation, but would turn what has been deplored as agricultural surpluses into a national asset.

This bill is the same plan which I introduced in Senate bill 1005, 85th Congress. However, I have noticed that support for the concept is now growing throughout the United States and among many Members of the Senate. I sincerely hope we shall enact such a measure this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 618) to assist recipients of public assistance and other needy persons in improving their nutritional standards; to assist in maintaining fair prices and incomes to farmers by providing additional outlets for surplus agricultural commodities; to prevent burdening and obstructing channels of interstate commerce; to promote the full use of agricultural resources, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DESIGNATION OF GOLDEN CORN TASSEL AS THE NATIONAL FLORAL EMBLEM

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution designating the golden corn tassel as the national floral emblem of the United States.

Mr. President, the golden corn tassel represents both the beauty and the bounty of this country. It is historically rooted in the Nation. The first corn was grown in this country 5,000 years ago, and since that time the corn has steadily improved in quality.

Corn is the basic food of man and beast. It provides raw material for industry. And in the autumn, when the corn becomes golden, it is a beautiful sight. It is a truly American floral emblem. Since the United States does not now have a national floral emblem, it is appropriate that the golden corn tassel be designated as such.

Mr. President, I know there are some who say the rose should be the national floral emblem. We have nothing whatsoever against the rose. There are many beautiful varieties of roses. But the rose is already the national floral emblem of a number of nations, including Great Britain, Rumania, and I believe, Costa Rica; and we should not imitate these nations.

My suggestion is that the rose—particularly the Peace rose—should be made the floral emblem of the United Nations.

But we in the United States should have a distinctive American emblem, the golden corn tassel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 23) designating the golden corn tassel as the national floral emblem of the United States, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. MARTIN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CHANGE OF NAME OF ROOSEVELT DAM IN ARIZONA

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, in 1911 the first of the large reclamation projects in this country was completed on the Salt River in Arizona. It was named properly at that time the Roosevelt Dam. It was named after one of our great Presidents, Theodore Roosevelt.

Theodore Roosevelt is a name that stands high in the affections of Arizonians. He spent much time in our State. He hunted its forests and fished its streams. From Arizona came the first of his Rough Riders whom he led up San Juan Hill.

Without meaning disrespect in any way to any other person by the name of Roosevelt but in order to keep the intent of the name perfectly clear and in order that future generations may not be confused as to the name of the President for whom this particular dam was named, it being named after Theodore Roosevelt, I have prepared a joint resolution to change the name of Roosevelt Dam in Arizona to Theodore Roosevelt Dam. I send the joint resolution to the desk and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 25) to change the name of Roosevelt Dam in Arizona to Theodore Roosevelt Dam, introduced by Mr. GOLDWATER was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PROPOSED EMERGENCY LEGISLALATION FOR DEPRESSED AREAS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 17, 1959, the names of Senators CLARK, BYRD of West Virginia, MORTON, RANDOLPH, and SCOTT were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 423) to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 (72 Stat. 89) to provide additional funds for the construction of highways in labor surplus areas, introduced by Mr. COOPER (for himself, Mr. DOUGLAS, and Mr. LANGER) on January 17, 1959.

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS FOOD PRODUCTS TO NEEDY FAMILIES IN THE UNITED STATES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 17, 1959, the names of Senators KEATING, CLARK, BUSH, MORTON, and SCOTT were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 489) to facilitate the distribution of surplus food products to needy families in the United States, introduced by Mr. COOPER (for himself, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. LANGER, and Mr. HENNINGS) on January 17, 1959.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] may be added as a cosponsor of S. 499, the bill to establish a Community Relations Service, which I introduced yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the majority leader's suggestion. I am a cosponsor on another so-called civil rights bill, and I serve as chairman of the subcommittee which will consider these two and any other bills which may be introduced on the subject. That subcommittee is the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, a creature of the Committee on the Judiciary. We hope that from the many bills which have been and will be presented, this vexing and thorny problem, the relations between the races in this country, and the civil rights of individuals, may be resolved by appropriate, sound, and practicable legislation. To that end, I am sure our subcommittee will bend every effort and do everything possible to harmonize the various suggestions and to bring out a bill which will be satisfactory, if not to all, at least to a substantial majority, of our people.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM BILL, 1959—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 20, 1959, the names of Senators CLARK, SPARKMAN, and HUMPHREY were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 505) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators) on January 20, 1959.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY OF RETIRED MEMBERS OF UNIFORMED SERVICES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 20, 1959, the name of Mr. GREEN was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 541) to equalize the pay of retired members of the uniformed services, introduced by Mr. JACKSON (for himself and other Senators) on January 20, 1959.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], be added as a cosponsor of the railroad retirement bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPRINTING OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL AND VETERANS' AFFAIRS RESOLUTION WITH ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I make the further unanimous consent request that both the railroad retirement bill (S. 226) and veterans' affairs resolution (S. Res. 19), which I submitted recently, calling for the creation of a standing committee of the Senate on veterans' affairs, be reprinted with the additional names of cosponsors included thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNAMARA in the chair). The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that there is an order of the Joint Committee on Printing which prohibits the request of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. It would be very helpful if we could get consistent rulings from the Parliamentarian when we ask for them. I was advised at the Parliamentarian's desk the other day that it was necessary to get unanimous consent when, as, and if a bill was reprinted in order that additional names may be added thereto. That was the request I made; I now repeat it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Oregon is agreed to within the existing rules.

Mr. MORSE. I never asked for anything outside the rules.

PROPOSED AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION WITH EURATOM

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, pursuant to section 123c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, the following documents were submitted to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy on January 14, 1959:

First. A proposed Agreement for Cooperation with the European Atomic Energy Community—Euratom—which was signed on November 8, 1958. This agreement, by law, must lie before the Joint Committee for 30 days for review while Congress is in session.

Second. A letter from the Atomic Energy Commission to the President recommending approval of the agreement.

Third. A letter from the President to the Atomic Energy Commission approving the agreement.

Fourth. Copies of letters that were exchanged between the representatives of the Community and the United States in which the Community's attention was called to the provisions of the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958—Public Law 85–846.

I ask that these documents be printed in the RECORD at this point.

Last year Congress approved an international agreement between the United States and Euratom providing the basis for cooperation in atomic power development, and Congress also enacted the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958—Public Law 85–846—which was approved by the President on August 28, 1958. Subsequent to these actions a draft Agreement for Cooperation was jointly reviewed with Euratom and revised in several particulars, prior to signing, to reflect applicable provisions of the Euratom Cooperation Act and certain questions raised during Joint Committee consideration of the proposed Euratom program last session.

The Atomic Energy Commission has prepared an analysis of the specific changes between the original and modified text of the proposed Agreement for Cooperation and I ask, Mr. President, that this analysis be inserted in the RECORD, together with the documents previously referred to.

The Subcommittee on Agreements for Cooperation of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy plans to hold public hearings today and tomorrow of this week, January 21 and 22, to discuss the details of the proposed Agreement for Cooperation with Euratom. At that time, representatives of the Atomic Energy Commission and the State Department will appear before the subcommittee to present their views on the proposed agreement and associated documents covering details of the joint program.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE EUROPEAN ATOMIC ENERGY COMMUNITY (EURATOM) CONCERNING PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Whereas the Government of the United States of America and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) on May 29 and June 18, 1958, signed an agreement which provides a basis for cooperation in programs for the advancement of the peaceful applications of atomic energy;

Whereas the Government of the United States of America and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) recognize that it would be to their mutual benefit to cooperate by establishing a joint program:

(a) To bring into operation within the European Atomic Community (Euratom) large-scale powerplants using nuclear reactors of types on which research and development have been carried to an advanced stage in the United States, having a total installed capacity of approximately 1 million kilowatts of electricity by December 31, 1963 (except that two reactors may be selected to be in operation by December 31, 1965), and under conditions which would approach the competitive range of conventional energy costs in Europe.

(b) To initiate immediately a joint research and development program centered on these types of reactors;

The parties agree as follows:

ARTICLE I

A. Under the joint program, reactor projects may be proposed, constructed, and operated by private or governmental organizations in the Community engaged in the power industry or in the nuclear-energy field. Such projects will be selected in accordance with technical standards, criteria (including those relating to radiation protection and reactor safety), and procedures developed by the United States Atomic Energy Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "United States Commission") and the Commission of the European Atomic Energy Community (hereinafter referred to as the "Euratom Commission"). In the evaluation and selection of such reactor projects, the technical and economic features will be considered and approved jointly by the United States Commission and the Euratom Commission. Other features of such reactor projects will be considered and approved by the Euratom Commission. Reactors now being planned or constructed in member states of the Community will be eligible for, and will receive, early consideration under the criteria established pursuant to this paragraph.

B. The total capital cost, exclusive of the fuel inventory, of the nuclear powerplants with an installed capacity of approximately 1 million kilowatts of electricity to be constructed under the program is estimated not to exceed the equivalent of $350 million, to be financed as follows:

1. Approximately $215 million to be provided by the participating utilities and other European sources of capital, such financing to be arranged with the appropriate assistance of the Community; and

2. Up to $135 million to be provided by the Government of the United States of America to the Community in the form of a long-term line of credit on terms and conditions to be agreed, including terms and conditions satisfactory to the parties regarding security for such loan, such funds to be re-lent by the Community for the construction of facilities under this program.

C. The U.S. Commission and the Euratom Commission will enter into special arrangements with respect to the fuel cycle of reactors to be constructed and operated under the joint program according to the principles set forth in annex A to this agreement.

ARTICLE II

A. The U.S. Commission and the Euratom Commission under mutually agreed arrangements intend to initiate a program of research and development to be conducted both in the United States and in Europe on the types of reactors to be constructed under the joint program. This research and development program will be aimed primarily at the improvement of the performance of these reactors, and at lowering fuel cycle costs. It will also deal with plutonium recycling and other problems relevant to these reactors.

B. The research and development program will be established for a 10-year period. During the first 5 years the financial contribution of the Government of the United States of America and the Community will amount to about $50 million each. Prior to the completion of the first 5-year period the parties will determine the financial requirements for the remaining 5-year period and will undertake to procure funds necessary to carry out the program. Funds for the second 5-year period may be in the same order of magnitude.

C. The administration of this program will be conducted under arrangements to be mutually agreed.

ARTICLE III

A. The U.S. Commission will sell to the Community uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} for use in projects designated by the parties pursuant to the joint program up to a net amount of 30,000 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium. This net amount shall be the gross quantity of contained U^{235} in uranium sold to the Community less the quantity of contained U^{235} in recoverable uranium which has been resold or otherwise returned to the Government of the United States of America or transferred to any other nation or international organization with the approval of the Government of the United States of America. The U.S. Commission will also from time to time sell to the Community such quantities of special nuclear material, in addition to the quantities of enriched uranium set forth above, as may be agreed.

B. Contracts for the sale of special nuclear materials will specify the quantities to be supplied, composition of material, compensation for material, delivery schedules, and other necessary terms and conditions. Such contracts for the sale of enriched uranium for fueling power reactors under the joint program may also provide, under terms and conditions to be agreed, that payment for such enriched uranium may be made on a deferred basis. Such terms and conditions will include an obligation that the Community return to the U.S. Commission enriched uranium to the extent that there is default in payment. The Community will grant no rights to third parties that may be inconsistent with such obligation. The uranium supplied hereunder for use in reactors designed for production of electric power may be enriched up to 20 percent by weight in the isotope U^{235}. The U.S. Commission, however, may, upon request and in its discretion, make a portion of the foregoing enriched uranium available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in materials testing reactors and research reactors, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium, and as highly enriched material for use for research purposes.

C. It is agreed that the Community may distribute special nuclear material to authorized users in the Community; the Community will retain, pursuant to the treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community, title to any special nuclear material which is purchased from the U.S. Commission.

D. The U.S. Commission is prepared to perform while such services are available from the Commission to its licensees in the United States, and on terms and conditions to be agreed, chemical reprocessing services with respect to any source or special nuclear material received by the Community from the United States under this program. It is agreed that such reprocessing will be performed at established United States domestic prices in effect upon delivery of such material. It is understood, except as may be otherwise agreed, that the form and content of any irradiated fuel elements shall not be altered after their removal from reactors and prior to delivery to the U.S. Commission or to other facilities. Special nuclear material and other material recoverable from material returned to the United States for reprocessing will be returned to the Community unless otherwise agreed. It is anticipated that any withdrawal by the U.S. Commission of chemical reprocessing services will be based upon the availability of commercial facilities to meet requirements for such services at reasonable prices, including the requirements of projects in the joint program. The U.S. Commission will give written notice to the Community of nonavailability of its chemical reprocessing services 12 months prior to such nonavailability.

E. With respect to any special nuclear material produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States under this agreement which is in excess of the need of the Community for such material for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, the International Atomic Energy Agency is granted the right of first option to purchase such material at the announced fuel value price in effect in the United States at the time of purchase. In the event this option is not exercised by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America is prepared to purchase such material at the U.S. announced fuel value price in effect at the time of purchase. However, with respect to plutonium produced in any reactor constructed under the joint program, no purchase commitment shall extend for a period beyond 10 years of operation of such reactor, or December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected under art. I, A), whichever is earlier. Extension of such period will be the subject of negotiation on the request of either party.

ARTICLE IV

The U.S. Commission will assist the Euratom Commission in obtaining reactor materials other than special nuclear material from private organizations located in the United States if the Euratom Commission desires such assistance. If no commercial sources are available, specific arrangements may be made by the parties, from time to time, under terms and conditions to be agreed, for the transfer of such materials.

ARTICLE V

Persons under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States of America or within the Community will be permitted to make arrangements to transfer and export material, including equipment and devices, to, and perform services for, the other party and such persons under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States of America or within the Community (as the case may be) as are authorized by the appropriate party to receive and possess such material and utilize such services, subject to applicable laws, directives, regulations, and license requirements of the Government of the United States of America, the Community and the member states of the Community.

ARTICLE VI

A. (1) Under mutually agreed arrangements, all nonpatentable information developed in connection with the joint program of research and development, and all nonpatentable information developed in connection with the selected projects, concerning designs, plans and specifications, construction costs, operations and economics, will be delivered currently to the parties as developed and may be used, disseminated, or published by each party for any and all purposes as it sees fit without further obligation or payment. There will be no discrimination in the dissemination or use of such information for the reason that the proposed recipient or user is a national of the United States or of any member state of the Community.

(2) Both parties shall have access to the records of the participating contractors pertaining to their participation in research and development projects under the joint research and development program, or pertaining to the performance of fuel elements that are the subject of U.S. guarantees.

B. The U.S. Commission and the Euratom Commission shall also exchange other unclassified information in fields related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy to further the joint program. Such exchange of information shall include technical advice in the design and construction of future reprocessing plants which the Community may decide to design and construct or sponsor.

C. The parties will expedite prompt exchange of information through symposia, exchange of personnel, setting up of combined teams, and other methods as may be mutually agreed.

D. Except as otherwise agreed, the application or use of any information (including designs, drawings, and specifications) and any material, equipment, and devices, exchanged or transferred between the parties under this agreement, shall be the responsibility of the party receiving it, and the other party does not warrant the accuracy or completeness of such information, nor the suitability of such information, materials, equipment, and devices for any particular use or application.

ARTICLE VII

A. As to any invention made or conceived in the course of or under the joint program of research and development:

1. The Government of the United States of America shall without further obligation or payment be entitled to assignment of the title and rights in and to the invention and the patents in the United States subject to a nonexclusive, irrevocable, and royalty-free license, with the right to grant sublicenses, to the Community for all purposes.

2. The Community shall without further obligation or payment be entitled to assignment of the title and rights in and to the invention and the patents in the Community subject to a nonexclusive, irrevocable, and royalty-free license, with the right to grant sublicenses, to the Government of the United States of America for all purposes.

3. With respect to title and rights in and to the invention and patents in third countries:

a. The Government of the United States of America, if the invention is made or conceived within the United States, or the Community, if the invention is made or conceived within the Community, shall be entitled to assignment of such title and rights, subject to a nonexclusive, irrevocable, and royalty-free license, with the right to grant sublicenses, to the other party for all purposes.

b. If the invention is made or conceived elsewhere, the party contracting for the work shall be entitled to assignment of such title and rights, subject to a nonexclusive, irrevocable, and royalty-free license, with the right to grant sublicenses to the other party for all purposes.

B. As to inventions and patents under paragraph A of this article neither party shall discriminate in the granting of any license or sublicense for the reason that the proposed licensee or sublicensee is a national of the United States or of any member state of the Community.

C. As to patents used in the work of the joint program, other than those under paragraph A, which the Government of the United States of America owns or as to which it has the right to grant licenses or sublicenses, the Government of the United States of America will agree to grant licenses or sublicenses, covering use either in or outside the joint program, on a nondiscriminatory basis to a member state and to industry of a member state, if the member state has agreed to grant licenses or sublicenses as to patents used in the work of the joint program which it owns or as to which it has the right to grant licenses or sublicenses, on a nondiscriminatory basis to the Government of the United States of America and to industry of the United States, covering use either in or outside the joint program.

D. The respective contractual arrangements of the parties with third parties shall contain provisions that will enable each party to effectuate the provisions of paragraphs A and B of this article as to patentable information.

E. It is recognized that detailed procedures shall be jointly established to effectuate the foregoing provisions and that all situations not covered shall be settled by mutual agreement governed by the basic principle of equivalent benefits to both parties.

ARTICLE VIII

The U.S. Commission and the Euratom Commission will work closely together to develop training programs to satisfy requirements of the joint program. The parties may under mutually agreeable terms and conditions make available their facilities for use by the other, including facilities to satisfy training needs.

ARTICLE IX

The Government of the United States of America and the Community recognize that adequate measures to protect equipment manufacturers and other suppliers as well as the participating utilities against now uninsurable risks are necessary to the implementation of the joint program. The Euratom Commission will seek to develop and to secure the adoption, by the earliest practicable date, of suitable measures which will provide adequate financial protection against third party liability. Such measures could involve suitable indemnification guarantees, national legislation, international convention, or a combination of such measures.

ARTICLE X

The Euratom Commission will take all action open to it under the treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community to minimize the impact of customs duties on goods and products imported under the joint program.

ARTICLE XI

The community guarantees that:

1. No material, including equipment and devices, transferred pursuant to this agreement to the community or to persons within the community, will be used for atomic weapons, or for research on or development of atomic weapons, or for any other military purpose;

2. No such material will be transferred to unauthorized persons or beyond the control of the community, except as the Government of the United States of America may agree to such transfer and then only if the transfer of the material is within the scope of an agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and another nation or group of nations;

3. No source of special nuclear material utilized in, recovered from, or produced as a result of the use of materials, equipment, or devices transferred pursuant to this agreement to the community or to persons within the community will be used for atomic weapons, or for research on or development of atomic weapons, or for any other military purpose;

4. The community will establish and maintain a mutually satisfactory system of safeguards and control as provided in article XII, to be applied to materials, equipment, and devices subject to the guarantees set forth in paragraphs 1 through 3 of this article.

ARTICLE XII

A. The Community undertakes the responsibility for establishing and implementing a safeguards and control system designed to give maximum assurance that any material, equipment or devices made available pursuant to this agreement and any source or special nuclear material derived from the use of such material, equipment and devices, shall be utilized solely for peaceful purposes. In establishing and implementing its safeguards and control system, the Community is prepared to consult with and exchange experiences with the International Atomic Energy Agency with the objective of establishing a system reasonably compatible with that of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Government of the United States of America and the Community agree that the principles which will govern the establishment and operation by the Community of a mutually satisfactory safeguards and control system under this agreement are those which are set forth in annex B to this agreement. The Community shall be responsible for establishing and maintaining a mutually satisfactory and effective safeguards and control system which is in accord with the principles set forth in annex B to this agreement.

B. As has been requested by the Community, the Government of the United States of America will provide assistance in establishing the Community's safeguards and control system, and will provide continuing assistance in the operation of the system.

C. The parties agree that there will be frequent consultations and exchanges of visits between the parties to give assurance to both parties that the Community's safeguards and control system effectively meets the responsibility and principles stated in paragraph A of this article and that the standards of the materials accountability systems of the Government of the United States of America and the Community are kept reasonably comparable.

D. In recognition of the importance of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America and the Community will consult with each other from time to time to determine whether there are any areas of responsibility with regard to safeguards and control and matters relating to health and safety in which the Agency might be asked to assist.

E. It is understood by the parties that a continuation of the cooperative program between the Government of the United States of America and the Community will be contingent upon the Community's establishing and maintaining a mutually satisfactory and effective safeguards and control system which is in accord with the principles set forth in annex B to this agreement.

ARTICLE XIII

The Government of the United States of America and the Community reaffirm their common interest in fostering the peaceful applications of atomic energy through the International Atomic Energy Agency and intend that the results of the joint program will benefit the Agency and the nations participating in it.

ARTICLE XIV

A. The parties anticipate that from time to time they may enter into further agreements providing for cooperation in the peaceful aspects of atomic energy.

B. Article 106 of the treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community contemplates that member states which before the date of entry into force of that treaty have concluded agreements with third countries for cooperation in the field of nuclear energy shall jointly with the Euratom Commission enter into the necessary negotiations with third countries in order as far as possible to cause the rights and obligations arising out of such agreements to be assumed by the Community. The Government of the United States of America is prepared to enter into such negotiations with reference to any agreement to which it is a party.

C. Existing agreements for cooperation in the field of nuclear energy between member states and the Government of the United States of America are not modified by the joint program. Modifications may be made as necessary by mutual agreement between the member states concerned and the United States to permit transfers of reactor projects now contemplated under existing agreements that qualify for and are accepted under the joint program.

ARTICLE XV

For the purposes of this agreement:

(a) "Person" means any individual, enterprise, corporation, partnership, firm, association, trust, estate, public or private institution, group, government agency, or government corporation, but does not include the parties to this agreement.

(b) "Special nuclear material" means (1) plutonium, uranium enriched in the isotope 233 or in the isotope 235, and any other material which either party determines to be special nuclear material; or (2) any material artificially enriched by any of the foregoing.

(c) "Source material" means (1) uranium, thorium, or any other material which is determined by either party to be source material; or (2) ores containing one or more of the foregoing materials, in such concentration as either party may determine from time to time.

(d) "Parties" means the Government of the United States of America, including the United States Atomic Energy Commission on behalf of the Government of the United States of America, and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom), acting through its Commission. "Party" means one of the parties.

ARTICLE XVI

A. The parties agree that the establishment and initiation of the joint program and the undertakings of the parties under this agreement are subject to appropriate statutory steps, including authorization by competent bodies of the Government of the United States of America and the Community, and the provisions of applicable laws, regulations, and license requirements in effect in the United States and in the Community and within the member states.

B. This agreement shall enter into force on the day on which each party shall have received from the other party written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such agreement and shall remain in force for a period of 25 years.

In witness whereof, the undersigned representatives duly authorized thereto have signed this agreement.

Done at Brussels this 8th day of November 1958, in duplicate, in the English, French, German, Italian, and Netherlands languages, each language being equally authentic.

ANNEX A

With the objective of assuring the success of the joint program, the U.S. Commission will offer guarantees designed to limit certain financial risks associated with the fuel cycle.

These guarantees will be extended in the form of maximum charges for fabrication of the fuel elements and minimum integrity of the fuel elements under irradiation. They will be offered only to the extent that equivalent or better guarantees are not available commercially.

The liability of the U.S. Commission under these guarantees will be limited to meeting guaranteed maximum charges for fabricated fuel elements and to the adjustment of charges for fabrication, chemical reprocessing, and transportation of fuel elements when required by failure to meet guaranteed integrity.

The guarantees will provide for equitable sharing of decreases in costs realized through fuel performance in excess of guaranteed levels, the United States share not to exceed costs experienced by the U.S. Commission under these guarantees.

The guarantees provided by the U.S. Commission will be applicable to all loadings made in reactors under the joint program during 10 years of operation or prior to December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected under article I, A, of this agreement for cooperation), whichever is earlier.

ANNEX B. PRINCIPLES FOR ESTABLISHING THE SAFEGUARDS AND CONTROL SYSTEM UNDER THIS AGREEMENT

The principles which will govern the establishment and operation of the safeguards and control system are as follows:

The Euratom Commission will:

1. Examine the design of equipment, devices, and facilities, including nuclear reactors, and approve it for the purpose of assuring that it will not further any military purpose and that it will permit the effective application of safeguards, if such equipment, devices, and facilities:

(a) are made available pursuant to this agreement; or

(b) use, process or fabricate any of the following materials received from the United States: source or special nuclear material, moderator material or any other material relevant to the effective application of safeguards; or

(c) use any special nuclear material produced as the result of the use of equipment or material referred to in subparagraphs (a) and (b).

2. Require the maintenance and production of operating records to assure accountability for source or special nuclear material made available, or source or special nuclear material used, recovered, or produced as a result of the use of source or special nuclear material, moderator material or any other material relevant to the effective application of safeguards or as a result of equipment, devices and facilities made available pursuant to this agreement.

3. Require that progress reports be prepared and delivered to the Euratom Commission with respect to projects utilizing material, equipment, devices and facilities referred to in paragraph 2 of this annex.

4. Establish and require the deposit and storage, under continuing safeguards, in Euratom facilities of any special nuclear material referred to in paragraph 2 of this annex which is not currently being utilized for peaceful purposes in the Community or otherwise transferred as provided in the agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Community.

5. Establish an inspection organization which will have access at all times:

(a) to all places and data, and

(b) to any person who by reason of his occupation deals with materials, equipment, devices, or facilities safeguarded under this agreement, necessary to assure accounting for source or special nuclear material subject to paragraph 2 of this annex and to determine whether there is compliance with the guarantees of the Community. The inspection organization will also be in a position to make and will make such independent measurements as are necessary to assure compliance with the provisions of this annex and the agreement for cooperation.

It is the understanding of the parties that the above principles applicable to the establishment of the Community's inspection and control system are compatible with and are based on article XII of the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, chapter VII of title II of the treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community, and those adopted by the Government of the United States of America in its comprehensive agreements for cooperation.

ANALYSIS PREPARED BY U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION ON THE MODIFICATION IN TEXT OF THE AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE EUROPEAN ATOMIC ENERGY COMMUNITY (EURATOM)

ORIGINAL TEXT AS CONTAINED IN AGREEMENT APPENDED TO LETTER TO JOINT COMMITTEE OF JUNE 23, 1958

(a) "To bring into operation by 1963, within the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom), large-scale powerplants using nuclear reactors of proven types on which research and development have been carried to an advanced stage in the United States, having a total installed capacity of approximately 1 million kilowatts of electricity and under conditions which would approach the competitive range of conventional energy costs in Europe."

MODIFIED TEXT

(a) "To bring into operation within the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) large-scale powerplants using nuclear reactors of types on which research and development have been carried to an advanced stage in the United States, having a total installed capacity of approximately 1 million kilowatts of electricity by December 31, 1963 (except that two reactors may be selected to be in operation by December 31, 1965), and under conditions which would approach the competitive range of conventional energy costs in Europe."

Discussion: As noted above, the preamble in the original text referred to a "1963" date and used the term "proven types" of reactors. In the course of the hearings before the Joint Committee it was clear that a number of members of the committee as well as representatives from industry equated the term "proven types" with water reactors or only with reactors that presently are capable of large-scale, reliable, operation. The committee believed that an interpretation of the words along these lines might hinder the program by precluding the incorporation of more advanced concepts that may prove to be eligible in time to meet the desired objectives. Accordingly, the Joint Committee deleted the word "proven" from before the word "types" in subsection 2(c) of the "Euratom Cooperation Act" to stress the fact that other types of reactors may be considered as the program develops. The committee similarly indicated that, in its judgment, the program would be more valuable if the goal of installing 1 million kilowatts of electricity by 1963 were made more flexible. The definition of the joint program in the Euratom Cooperation Act accordingly was changed to provide that two reactors could be selected to come into operation by December 31, 1965. (It was intended that this extension of the goal for two reactors would be permissive only, and not mandatory.) The changes shown above in the preamble of the agreement have been made to reflect these changes.

B. CAPITAL LOAN

Article I, Section B

2. Up to $135 million to be provided by the Government of the United States of America to the Community in the form of a long-term line of credit on terms and conditions to be agreed, such funds to be re-lent by the Community for the construction of facilities under this program.

ARTICLE I, SECTION B

2. Up to $135 million to be provided by the Government of the United States of America to the Community in the form of a long-term line of credit on terms and conditions to be agreed, including terms and conditions satisfactory to the parties regarding security for such loan, such funds to be re-lent by the Community for the construction of facilities under this program.

Discussion: During the congressional hearings on the program several members of the Joint Committee also stressed the point that the United States should receive adequate security to protect its financial interest in the capital loan to be made to Euratom. The foregoing underlined phrase has been added to section B of article I so as to make it quite clear that adequate security will have to be provided before the loan can be consummated.

C. DEFERRED SALE AGREEMENT

Article III, Section B

B. Contracts for the sale of special nuclear materials will specify the quantities to be supplied, composition of material, compensation for material, delivery schedules and other necessary terms and conditions. Such contracts for the sale of enriched uranium for fueling power reactors under the joint program may also provide, under terms and conditions to be agreed, that payment for such enriched uranium may be made on a deferred basis. The uranium supplied hereunder for use in reactors designed for production of electric power may be enriched up to 20 percent by weight in the isotope U^{235}. The U.S. Commission, however, may, upon request and in its discretion, make a portion of the foregoing enriched uranium available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in materials testing reactors and research reactors, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium, and as highly enriched material for use for research purposes.

Article III, Section B

B. Contracts for the sale of special nuclear materials will specify the quantities to be supplied, composition of material, compensation for material, delivery schedules and other necessary terms and conditions. Such contracts for the sale of enriched uranium for fueling power reactors under the joint program may also provide, under terms and conditions to be agreed, that payment for such enriched uranium may be made on a deferred basis. Such terms and conditions will include an obligation that the Community return to the U.S. Commission enriched uranium to the extent that there is default in payment. The Community will grant no rights to third parties that may be inconsistent with such obligation. The uranium supplied hereunder for use in reactors designed for production of electric power may be enriched up to 20 percent by weight in the isotope U^{235}. The U.S. Commission, however, may upon request and in its discretion, make a portion of the foregoing enriched uranium available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in materials testing reactors and research reactors, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium, and as highly enriched material for use for research purposes.

Discussion: Under the terms of the joint program it is anticipated that the United States will sell the initial operating inventory (which is estimated to amount to approximately 9,000 kilograms) to the Community on a deferred payment basis. The proposed changes in the text are designed to make it clear that the Atomic Energy Commission will retain such rights in the material as are appropriate to secure the payment of the debt due under the sales agreement. Pursuant to section 5 of the Euratom Cooperation Act the Government of the United States will be obliged to obtain the equivalent of a first lien on any such material for which payment is not made in full at the time of transfer.

D. PROVISION OF REPROCESSING SERVICES

Article III, Section D

D. The U.S. Commission is prepared to perform on terms and conditions to be agreed chemical reprocessing services with respect to any source or special nuclear material received by the Community from the United States under this program. It is agreed that such reprocessing will be performed at established United States domestic prices in effect upon delivery of such material. It is understood, except as may be otherwise agreed, that the form and content of any irradiated fuel elements shall not be altered after their removal from reactors and prior to delivery to the U.S. Commission or to other facilities. Special nuclear material and other material recoverable from material returned to the United States for reprocessing will be returned to the Community unless otherwise agreed.

[Modified text]

Article III, Section D

D. The U.S. Commission is prepared to perform while such services are available from the Commission to its licensees in the United States, and on terms and conditions to be agreed chemical reprocessing services with respect to any source or special nuclear material received by the Community from the United States under this program. It is agreed that such reprocessing will be performed at established U.S. domestic prices in effect upon delivery of such material. It is understood, except as may be otherwise agreed, that the form and content of any irradiated fuel elements shall not be altered after their removal from reactors and prior to delivery to the U.S. Commission or to other facilities. Special nuclear material and other material recoverable from material returned to the United States for reprocessing will be returned to the Community unless otherwise agreed. It is anticipated that any withdrawal by the U.S. Commission of chemical reprocessing services will be based upon the availability of commercial facilities to meet requirements for such services at reasonable prices, including the requirements of projects in the joint program. The U.S. Commission will give written notice to the Community of nonavailability of its chemical reprocessing services 12 months prior to such nonavailability.

Discussion: Section D of article III in the original agreement was written before the passage of Public Law 85-681 and it provided that the AEC would be prepared to perform, on terms and conditions to be agreed, chemical reprocessing services with respect to any source or special nuclear material received from the United States under the joint program. The permissive authority for the Commission to enter into such contracts on a long-term basis with foreign countries is contained in section 7(u) of Public Law 85-681. Section 7(u) provides that the Commission will provide such services while comparable services are available to persons licensed in this country pursuant to section 103 or 104 of the Atomic Energy Act. The additional language inserted in article III of the revised agreement is designed to make the agreement consistent with the new legislation. It also makes it clear that the withdrawal of Commission services will be based upon the availability of commercial facilities at reasonable prices and that the Commission will give the Community a year's notice before withdrawing its services. These changes indicate that reprocessing services will not be offered to Euratom by the Commission on terms more favorable than those offered to U.S. industry.

E. PURCHASE OF PLUTONIUM

Article III, Section E

E. With respect to any special nuclear material produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States under this agreement which is in excess of the need of the Community for such material for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, the International Atomic Energy Agency is granted the right of first option to purchase such material at the announced fuel value price in effect in the United States at the time of purchase. In the event this option is not exercised by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America is prepared to purchase such material at the United States announced fuel price in effect at the time of purchase.

Article III, Section E

E. With respect to any special nuclear material produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States under this agreement which is in excess of the need of the Community for such material for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, the International Atomic Energy Agency is granted the right of first option to purchase such material at the announced fuel value price in effect in the United States at the time of purchase. In the event this option is not exercised by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America is prepared to purchase such material at the United States announced fuel price in effect at the time of purchase. However, with respect to plutonium produced in any reactor constructed under the joint program, no purchase commitment shall extend for a period beyond 10 years of operation of such reactor, or December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected under art. I, A), whichever is earlier. Extension of such period will be the subject of negotiation on the request of either party.

Discussion: Under the terms of article III, paragraph E, of the Agreement for Cooperation as it was originally written, and presented to the Joint Committee, the Government of the United States would have agreed to purchase any and all special nuclear material produced in reactors fueled by the United States under the program which would be in excess of Euratom's need for such material for peaceful purposes and which would not be acquired by the International Atomic Energy Agency under the option accorded to it. In the judgment of the Atomic Energy Commission this language appeared to impose a broader obligation on the United States to acquire such material than would appear to be permitted under the terms of the Euratom Cooperation Act, since the obligation might be construed to last for the term of the agreement. Section 6(b) of the Cooperation Act, provides that the Commission may not enter into any contract for the acquisition of plutonium produced in any reactor constructed under the joint program, which is longer in term than 10 years of operation of such reactors or December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected under the program), whichever is earlier. The proposed modification to the agreement is designed to make the Agreement for Cooperation consistent on its face with the Euratom Cooperation Act. Under the terms of the Cooperation Act the Atomic Energy Commission is authorized to acquire from the community, pursuant to the Agreement for Cooperation, up to 4,100 kilograms of plutonium for use only for peaceful purposes.

F. ANNEX A (FUEL CYCLE GUARANTEES)

Annex A

The guarantees provided by the U.S. Commission will be applicable to all loadings made in reactors under the joint program during 10 years of operation or prior to December 31, 1973, whichever is earlier.

Annex A

The guarantees provided by the U.S. Commission will be applicable to all loadings made in reactors under the joint program during 10 years of operation or prior to December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected under article I.A. of this Agreement for Cooperation), whichever is earlier.

This change was made in the annex to clearly reflect the permissive authority regarding two deferred projects as contained in the Euratom Cooperation Act.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 6, 1958.

The Honorable JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Under date of November 3, 1958, the Atomic Energy Commission has recommended, and has noted that the Department of State supports such recommendation, that I approve the proposed agreement entitled "Agreement for Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) Concerning the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy," and authorize its execution. This agreement would permit the execution of the program of cooperation with Euratom which I approved under a letter dated June 17, 1958, to you and the Secretary of State and which I strongly recommended to the Congress on June 23, 1958.

The aim of the joint program will be to bring into operation in the Community large-scale powerplants using nuclear reactors of types on which research and development have been carried to an advanced stage in the United States, having a total installed capacity of approximately 1 million kilowatts of electricity. This goal is to be achieved by December 31, 1963, except that two reactors may be selected to be in operation by December 31, 1965. The United States and Euratom also will initiate immediately a joint research and development program centered on these types of reactors.

The agreement provides that the projects to be supported will be jointly selected according to criteria to be developed by the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission of the European Atomic Energy Community. It is estimated that the total capital cost of the plants to be constructed (exclusive of fuel) will not exceed $350 million. Approximately $135 million of this amount will be provided by the United States in the form of a long-term line of credit under terms to be agreed. Under the terms of annex "A" to the agreement the United States agrees to guarantee ceiling costs for the fabrication of fuel elements required under the program as well as a fixed life for these elements. These guaranties will be applicable to all loadings made in reactors under the joint program during 10 years of operation or prior to December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected), whichever is earlier. Article II of the agreement outlines the nature of the joint research and development program. This program is expected to be centered on improvement in the performance of the reactors involved in the program, and the lowering of fuel cycle costs.

The United States Atomic Energy Commission, in accordance with the provisions of article III, will sell to the Community up to a net quantity of 30,000 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium to cover the fueling and other requirements of the program over the term of the agreement. The United States also will provide the Community with chemical reprocessing services, under terms to be agreed, with respect to any source or special nuclear material received by Euratom from this country under the joint program.

In recognition of the important responsibilities of the International Atomic Energy Agency, article II grants to the Agency the right of first option to purchase special nuclear materials that are produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States under the joint program that are in excess of the Community's need for material for peaceful purposes. If this option is not exercised the United States will be prepared to purchase such material, except that no purchase commitment with regard to plutonium will extend for more than 10 years of operation or December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors), whichever is earlier.

One of the major purposes of the program is to provide industry in the Community and the United States with important engineering experience and data on capital and operating costs. Article VI accordingly provides that defined technological and economic data developed under the joint program will be exchanged under provisions designed to permit widespread dissemination of information developed in the course of the program. Patent provisions designed to facilitate this purpose appear in article VII.

The Community undertakes, by the earliest practicable date, to secure the adoption of suitable measures which will provide equipment manufacturers and other suppliers under the program with adequate financial protection against third-party liability (art. IX). The Community also will take all action open to it under the Euratom Treaty to minimize the impact of customs duties on products imported under the program (art. X).

Under the terms of article XI, the Community has made all the guarantees required by the Atomic Energy Act. Article XII contains additional provisions designed to assure that materials involved in the program will be used solely for peaceful purposes.

The execution of this agreement will facilitate one of the most notable advances in the atoms-for-peace program since the program's inception.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and upon the recommendation of the Atomic Energy Commission, supported by the Department of State, I hereby—

(1) Determine that the performance of the proposed agreement will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security of the United States; and

(2) Approve the proposed Agreement for Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) enclosed with your letter; and

(3) Authorize the execution of the proposed agreement for the Government of the United States of America by appropriate authorities of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT EISENHOWER.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., November 3, 1958.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Attached to the letter to you of June 12, 1958, concerning the joint nuclear power program proposed between the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) and the United States of America, from the Secretary of State and the then Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, was a draft agreement for cooperation between the United States and the European Atomic Energy Community. This agreement was forwarded at the time for your information with the understanding that it would be resubmitted for your approval in the usual manner in accordance with the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act, after the international agreement required by sections 11(1) and 124 of the act was approved by Congress. On August 20, 1958, the Congress approved the international agreement.

The "Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958" (Public Law 85-846), containing certain necessary legislative authorizations, was approved by you on August 28, 1958. The Agreement for Cooperation submitted with the letter of June 12 has been revised in several particulars in order specifically to reflect applicable provisions of the Euratom Cooperation Act and its legislative history. A schedule showing the specific changes between the original and modified text is attached as appendix A. The revised agreement, entitled "Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) Concerning Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy," is enclosed as appendix B.

The Atomic Energy Commission recommends that you approve the enclosed proposed agreement and authorize its execution. The Department of State supports the Commission's recommendation. The Community fully understands that the undertakings of the United States under the agreement will be subject to the provisions of the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958, as well as other applicable laws. Letters to this effect have been exchanged.

The aim of the joint program will be to bring into operation in the Community large-scale powerplants using nuclear reactors of types on which research and development have been carried to an advanced stage in the United States, having a total installed capacity of approximately 1 million kilowatts of electricity. This goal is to be achieved by December 31, 1963, except that two reactors may be selected to be in operation by December 31, 1965. The United States and Euratom also will initiate immediately a joint research and development program centered on these types of reactors.

The agreement provides that the projects to be supported will be jointly selected according to criteria to be developed by the United States Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission of the European Atomic Energy Community. It is estimated that the total capital cost of the plants to be constructed (exclusive of fuel) will not exceed $350 million. Approximately $215 million of this amount will be provided by European sources of capital and up to $135 million will be provided by the United States in the form of a long-term line of credit under terms to be agreed. Under the terms of annex A to the agreement the United States agrees to guarantee ceiling costs for the fabrication of fuel elements required under the program as well as a fixed life for these elements. These guarantees will be applicable to all loadings made in reactors under the joint program during 10 years of operation or prior to December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors selected), whichever is earlier. Article II of the agreement outlines the nature of the joint research and development program. This program is expected to be centered on improvement in the performance of the reactors involved in the program, and the lowering of fuel cycle costs.

The United States Atomic Energy Commission, in accordance with the provisions of article III, will sell to the Community up to a net quantity of 30,000 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium to cover the fueling and other requirements of the program over the term of the agreement. The United States also will provide the Community with chemical reprocessing services, under terms to be agreed, with respect to any source or special nuclear material received by Euratom from this country under the joint program.

In recognition of the important responsibilities of the International Atomic Energy Agency, article III grants to the Agency the right of first option to purchase special nuclear materials that are produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States under the joint program that are in excess of the Community's need for material for peaceful purposes. If this option is not exercised the United States will be prepared to purchase such material, except that no purchase commitment with regard to plutonium will extend for more than 10 years of operation or December 31, 1973 (or December 31, 1975, for not more than two reactors), whichever is earlier.

One of the major purposes of the program is to provide industry in the Community and the United States with important engineering experience and data on capital and operating costs. Article VI accordingly provides that defined technological and economic data developed under the joint program will be exchanged under provisions designed to permit widespread dissemination of information developed in the course of the program. Patent provisions designed to facilitate this purpose appear in article VII.

The Community undertakes, by the earliest practicable date, to secure the adoption of suitable measures which will provide equipment manufacturers and other suppliers under the program with adequate financial protection against third party liability (article IX). The Community also will take all action open to it under the Euratom Treaty to minimize the impact of customs duties on products imported under the program (article X).

Under the terms of article XI, the Community has made all the guarantees required by the Atomic Energy Act. Article XII contains additional provisions designed to assure that materials involved in the program will be used solely for peaceful purposes.

The Secretary of State and I regard this agreement as an important and major first step in establishing cooperation with the European Atomic Energy Community. Its execution will facilitate one of the most notable advances in the atoms-for-peace program since the program's inception. Following your approval, the agreement will be formally executed by the appropriate authorities of the European Atomic Energy Community and the Government of the United States of America and will be placed before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in compliance with section 123c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, upon the reconvening of the Congress.

Respectfully,

(S) HAROLD S. VANCE,
Acting Chairman.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., October 3, 1958.

His Excellency LOUIS ARMAND,
51-53 rue Belliard, Brussels.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I take pleasure in transmitting herewith a copy of the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958 (Public Law 85-846, 85th Cong., approved Aug. 28, 1958). This act provides certain of the legislative authorizations needed for implementing the joint program contemplated by the proposed agreement for cooperation.

As you know, article XVI of the proposed agreement for cooperation specifies, among other things, that the undertakings of the parties are subject to the provisions of law in affecting the United States, the Community, and the member states. In accordance with that article, the undertakings of this Government under the agreement will be subject to the provisions of the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958 as well as other applicable laws. For example, because of the requirement in section 5 of the act that this Government obtain the equivalent of a first lien in deferred payment sales, the individual agreements in the case of each reactor project will have to define the rights of the United States in considerably more detail than does article 3.B of the agreement for cooperation. We recognize the differences in the lien concept as it exists under U.S. law and security devices that exist under the laws of the several member states, but it will be incumbent upon us because of section 5 to resolve these differences so that the rights of the United States to repossession of material in case of any default will satisfy the requirements of section 5.

Somewhat in the same category is the limitation in section 6(A) of the act upon the purchase of plutonium pursuant to article 3.E of the agreement for cooperation; the 4,100-kilogram limitation, which we agree limits the obligation of the United States to purchase, will have to be apportioned pursuant to the detailed implementing agreements as seems suitable.

You will note also the requirements of section 7 of the act with respect to the liability of this Government. This section, and any other requirements of the act that are applicable, will be implemented in the Atomic Energy Commission's detailed arrangements under the joint program.

I should further like to point out that the Atomic Energy Commission has thus far obtained an initial authorization for fiscal year 1959 of $3 million for the research and development program, and subsequent expenditures will need further legislative authorization. It will also be necessary to obtain additional authorization with respect to the Commission's fuel cycle guarantee arrangements. Authorization and funds for the research and development program and fuel cycle guarantee will be sought as needed.

Sincerely yours,

W. WALTON BUTTERWORTH,
Ambassador.

BRUSSELS, October 3, 1958.

The Honorable W. WALTON BUTTERWORTH,
27 Boulevard du Régent, Brussels.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of today's date, enclosing a copy of the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958, which provides certain of the legislative authorizations needed for U.S. implementation of the joint program contemplated by the proposed agreement for cooperation.

We understand fully and agree that by virtue of article XVI of the proposed agreement the undertakings of the United States under the agreement will be subject to the provisions of the Euratom Cooperation Act of 1958, including those relating to deferred payment sales and to the 4,100-kilogram limitation on the obligation of the United States to purchase plutonium, as well as other applicable laws. We also understand that it will be necessary for the Atomic Energy Commission to obtain additional authorization and funds for the research and development program and for fuel cycle guarantees, and that you will seek authorization and funds as needed.

Sincerely yours,

EMANUEL SASSEN.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate received today from the President of the United States the nomination of Philip W. Bonsal, of the District of Columbia, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Cuba, vice Earl E. T. Smith.

Notice is given that the Committee on Foreign Relations at the expiration of 6 days, in accordance with the committee rule, will give consideration to this nomination.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF STONEWALL JACKSON

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I rise to speak in commemoration of the 135th anniversary of the birth of a noble West Virginian, Thomas Jonathan Jackson—known to his troops in the War Between the States, and to posterity since as Stonewall.

It is testimony to the measure of the man, as well as to the healing effects of time, that both the sovereign States of Virginia and West Virginia—though on different sides of that tragic conflict—are proud to claim him as a son.

On January 21, 1824, Stonewall Jackson was born in the western region of Virginia, in what is now the city of Clarksburg, W. Va. His life differed only in the degree of his achievements from that typical of the hardy Scotch-Irish pioneers who settled there, and who so generously contributed to the development of this Republic.

Although Stonewall Jackson was committed to a cause which our Nation has since rejected, his life still holds a lesson for us today. It is not to the cause he served that we must look, but to the character of the man which carried him through adversity with such unswerving devotion to duty.

Although this most brilliant of Lee's generals was the first to die in combat, his name has become legend in the South, as well as in the North. His quality of character transcended the lines of battle. Firm in his resolve to duty, benevolent and just in his relations to his men, and devout in his faith in God, Stonewall Jackson never faltered in his belief that, in his own words, "God and events conspire to my benefit."

And thus did events conspire until the fatal day of May 10, 1863, when Stonewall Jackson died from wounds inflicted by his own troops in the confusion of the Battle of Chancellorsville. Here came to an end the career of one of the most distinguished sons of the upper Monongahela Valley. But his faith in his Creator and his confidence in the justice of the cause he served continued to inspire the men of the Stonewall Brigade to exploits which will be honored as long as valor is valued.

This quality was recognized even in the Capital of the Nation against which Jackson was fighting. As was stated in an editorial of the Daily Chronicle, of Washington, D.C., on the occasion of his death:

> Stonewall Jackson was a great general, a brave soldier, a noble Christian, and a pure man.

The passage of time and the reunion of the Republic have resolved the question of civil conflict; but the years have not diminished, but rather have enhanced, the stature of Stonewall Jackson, and on this anniversary of his birth, I pay tribute to him.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It would be possible for the Senate to adjourn from Friday until Tuesday of next week, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I announce for the information of Senators that it is not planned to have any yea-and-nay votes on Friday. It is planned to have the Senate meet and transact routine business, affording opportunity for Senators to submit any statements they may wish to make, following which it is planned to take an adjournment until Tuesday next.

DEATH OF CECIL B. DE MILLE

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, today Hollywood mourns the death of its greatest citizen, Cecil B. de Mille.

But in a larger sense his death will be noted and felt all over the world. Perhaps more than any other person connected with motion pictures, De Mille was an international figure, known, wherever a picture has ever been seen, as a giant among moviemakers.

His pictures made the American movie an international commodity. Best known for his great Biblical dramas, this son of a minister proved that the story of religion, the story of the founding of Christianity, had universal appeal to people of all races and religions. His pictures have been seen by more millions of people than those of all other moviemakers combined, and some of his pictures more than a quarter of a century old are still drawing audiences in far reaches of the earth.

He was a pioneer in an industry that brought America to the world. His death is a great loss to that industry and to his associates in Paramount Pictures, particularly Barney Balaban, whose faith in De Mille helped insure the production of the great epics associated with De Mille.

I join in my profound condolences to his family and his colleagues and associates.

SENIORS ON THE MARCH

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, many of us are aware that life in the twilight years may not always turn out to be what we would like it to be. Often this is the result of our failure to encourage the utilization of the talents of our elderly citizens who now number 13 million throughout the United States.

What can be done by our elderly citizens themselves to improve their prestige status? The answers to this question were sought in an address delivered in Lakeland, Fla., on January 12 by Mr. R. O. Beckman, of Hialeah, syndicated newspaper columnist of "The Vintage Years" and director of the nonprofit Senior Service Foundation. The address followed the launching of Seniors International, designed as a federation of senior clubs.

The address delivered by Mr. Beckman, who has long pioneered greater recognition of the impact of a fast aging population upon our civilization, was an inspiring one, laying emphasis on increased self-help and participation in our society by the elderly generation itself.

It merits the attention of every Member of Congress who earnestly seeks to solve many of the problems with which our elderly citizens are confronted today.

I ask unanimous consent to have the address, entitled "Seniors on the March," printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENIORS ON THE MARCH

(By R. O. Beckman)

Sixty years ago a British journalist, in a book called "The Land of the Dollar," told of an extended debate in a New York newspaper as to whether old people had any rights that should be respected. Some of the letter writers even questioned their right to existence. The Britisher said life was so strenuous over here that there were few older people over 50—they were all "shouldered unmercifully out of existence", or at least into the poorhouse.

Since then things may have taken a turn for the better. We now have social security and at 65-plus we live "the life of Riley" on an average total income from all sources of $30 a week. If we don't rate security benefits we can take a pauper's oath and receive up to $15 a week: 2½ million of us are in that situation. Those with health insurance have longer life and better health in consequence of recent medical discoveries. Despite enforced retirement, one out of five of our elders are still allowed to earn an income. Red Feather agencies now allocate from half a cent to 4 cents per capita for care of the aged out of total expenditures ranging from $2.68 to $5.02. The suicide rate for persons of 65 to 74 is about the same as in 1900 but higher for the 75–84 bracket. In the retirement State of Florida it is a third higher in the 55–74 range than elsewhere.

The newly elected president of the American Medical Association states that the most important "problem" facing us today is that of an aging population. The Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare says we need to double our expenditures for social security, education, health, and welfare services during the next decade; right now only about 8 percent of our national product goes for such purposes. These statements seem somehow to imply that this is not yet the best of all possible worlds in which to grow old. Is the hope that later maturity will soon become life's "golden age" a mere fantasy?

After 60 years we are now in the push-button age, provided of course we can afford to pay for the push-buttons. Only 30 years ago we had never heard of food freezers, transistor hearing aids, electric typewriters, Polaroid cameras, foam rubber, V–8 engines, fiberglas, jet planes, electric razors, or atomic submarines. The land of the dollar is still chasing it, spending most of its income and brain power on mechanical gadgets, atomic bombs and moon rockets.

What of our progress in the nonmaterial aspects of life, in the spiritual values of mature men in this topsy-turvy world of ours? There are observers who feel that the assessed valuation of old age is as low, or lower, than it was 60 years ago. The bottom seems to have fallen out of the market for the experience and know-how of later maturity. Popular prejudice continues to deprive most older persons of recognition and privileges, and perhaps of basic rights. This is inconsistent when increasing numbers continue mentally alert and physically competent until they are well into the eighties. Many of our older people have become third-class citizens. Financially dependent, they have lost the sense of personal worth and status, caught in the grip of aimless loneliness that hurts 24 hours a day. They are not only in the doghouse but the kennel has been stored away in the attic.

In consequence, every man and woman that faces the problem of old age must find an answer to the question: "Are you working on a solution or are you just a part of the problem?" On the basis of his answer he will find himself in one of the two big categories into which the 65-plus population is divided—the "drones" or the "doers." Among the drones you find the idle sitters, frustrated elderly "beatniks"; self-centered old goats whose world revolves around themselves; testy tight-wads that can't spare a dime for less fortunate seniors; opinionated fossils that refuse to admit the world has changed. They often blame society rather than admit that they are unhappy because they live without aim or purpose. They are like cows who eat grass as a matter of course, without reflecting that its purpose is to provide nourishment for a happier life.

Such drones are largely responsible for the lowered prestige into which old age has fallen. They stand at the bar of youthful public opinion with little justification for existence. The court, however, may lose patience with a continued wave of senior delinquency.

This may well happen in the foreseeable future, in view of the upsurge in numbers of the aged. World population reached a billion in 1850 and 2 billion in 1920. At the present rate of increase it will double in another 50 years. When the food supply no longer keeps pace with population, hunger brings wars. In such a situation public opinion will first express its resentment against the useless elderly consumers.

In the United States there will be twice as many, perhaps three times as many, persons over 65 by 1980. A tripled senior population is inevitable after we devise cures for heart and circulatory diseases and cancer. Such cures appear on their way. Hormones may be found that will reverse the aging process. If all of us live to 100 in good health, what is now foreseeen as a boon may turn into an economic tragedy. Too many oldsters will not only intensify a shortage of food but lead to the bankruptcy of our social security system and the insurance companies from which we obtain our pension benefits. Present payroll deductions for security are adequate only for benefits calculated on a shorter life expectancy. We therefore need to anticipate, to plan ahead for the impact of a longer life span on our economy.

In a hard-pressed, overpopulated world what will happen to the surplus aged millions, particularly if they are drones or useless parasites? Who can say that in a hungry world the aged will not be exterminated? Time magazine reports that what are in essence concentration camps have already been set up in China for the aged. When they die, they are dropped into chemical fertilizer vats so that their bones will help grow next year's rice crop. Let us not forget the programs of Nazi Germany and Russia. In hard times the Eskimos used to set oldsters afloat on cakes of ice. In certain South Sea isles old men were forced to climb coconut trees which were then rocked back and forth to see how many could hold on. These are unsavory but needed reminders of man's inhumanity to his elders.

Some of the older generation already consider themselves as expendable as consumer goods or shock troops and ammunition during the World War. Only a few days ago I had a letter from a disillusioned oldster who in all seriousness offered himself, and a friend, as guinea pigs to be used as rocket passengers in outer space research or in medical experimentation designed to increase the life span.

The second classification of older persons is not expendable and does not so consider itself. It is made up of those willing to stand up and be counted, those with enough initiative to use their potential constructively. They are the folks that have fully matured, who have developed an attitude or way of life in which the wisdom acquired over the years guides their surplus energy (over and above that needed to sustain life) into worthwhile channels. They recognize that individual development and education are lifelong processes.

There is an informal organization with branches throughout the country that encourages creative maturity. One of the discussions was attended by an earnest lad with a discriminating mind but just out of his teens. You'll enjoy his description of the purpose of the organization. Said he: "The creative maturity group is a bunch of guys and dolls ranging all the way from those that won't see 35 again to those whose hands tremble so they can't hold a cup of coffee without spilling it. This gang has a hunch that it's the job of every human to grow up, to keep on pitching as long as he or she is still breathing—to live and learn and make something out of it, as the saying goes. Now this concept says that the last half, or even the last 10 percent of life, is the vintage time to collect. When you're getting to the end of the road, pal, it's time to pick the fruit. They also say that if you want a lot of juicy fruit you got to start preparing for it when you're a young punk, see?"

Is it just wishful thinking to assume that more of the 15 millions over age 65 could get more out of life if they adopted the philosophy of creative maturity? That with the present-day expansion of their physical capacity, they can find and use constructive outlets for their potential? Is there enough imagination and desire among them or is the rank-and-file so beaten down and frustrated that to reactivate it would be a hopeless task? If but little can be done by today's oldsters then we are merely laying down a blueprint for those of an uncertain tomorrow.

There are hundreds of thousands of oldsters whose sparkplugs are functioning well and who can greatly enrich their later years. Cranking some of the model T's, may, of course, be a back-breaking job. Your presence here, the existence of hundreds of senior clubs throughout the Nation, and the organization of Seniors International is proof that you have faith in the opportunities of later maturity.

Two interrelated types of action seem to be needed to get old age out of the doghouse, one directed at the public and the younger generation and the second at the older folks themselves. Educational effort and propaganda to win greater recognition for maturity has been slow and inadequate. A bit of dynamite instead of earthworms may be needed to loosen the encrusted soil of public indifference. The publicizing of a distasteful cause is, however, an expensive business. Senior organizations just don't have that kind of money. More can be done by organizing and stimulating groups of seniors to improve their own situation. By organization I don't refer to mere social clubs that do nothing but play bridge or pinochle or shuffleboard and throw an occasional square dance. Companionship is, of course, a crying need to combat loneliness but the goal of 14-carat maturity lies not in self-centered gratification, but in service in making the world a better place in which to live. Primarily the emphasis must be placed on service to the community. We must be better neighbors.

Senior organizations will play a leading role in creating a brave new climate in which to grow older. They can offer a unique opportunity to mature persons to join with others in becoming doers instead of drones. The printed objectives of Seniors International, the American Association of Retired Persons, and Senior Citizens of America, all embody the concept of creative maturity. These goals cannot be achieved overnight since they involve difficult decisions of effective organization, manpower, and financing. Since I am uninformed regarding your detailed plans for organization and operation, it would be presumptuous to comment on the developmental pattern which you are setting up. It may be in order, however, to suggest a few worthwhile goals and activities in which local groups could be encouraged and which will add to their community prestige. Achievement by seniors brings new respect for old age.

It is in order to suggest that the program of every senior group should include projects that will advance the prestige and status of the elder generation. Oldsters are entitled to a free choice and the right to self-help in planning their own futures. Too many persons are inclined to pass the responsibility for improving conditions to the Government, to organized welfare, or academic research. Representatives of these groups too often assume that their group has a monopoly in activity in behalf of the aging. Such activity should not be undertaken for older people but with them, and more especially by them. Have we forgotten that the Lord helps those that help themselves? Now as to specific projects:

1. The membership of a local group may comprise any persons that are likely to be congenial but efforts should be made to make it essentially democratic and truly representative of the entire elder community. The so-called Golden Age Clubs organized to date have been largely sponsored by welfare agencies, or as adjuncts to what used to be called settlement houses and therefore primarily served the underprivileged. These persons are the ones most in need of social contacts but they carry little prestige. Very few clubs have enrolled men and women of higher economic status. Retired executives and professional men will participate provided the club objectives offer a challenge for civic or cultural progress or personal development. Broad-gaged leadership is imperative; I have seen a number of clubs go to seed because of cliques or where a few prima donnas insisted on dominating the group for personal influence instead of public service.

2. As to a program of activities, primary emphasis may well be placed on voluntary neighborly services of a personal nature that will meet the needs of older persons. Many clubs offer home service in finding the best way out of lack of companionship, family or financial complications, illness or temporary disability, transportation, the need for supplemental employment, or a place to live. Women often make the best friendly visitors.

3. Senior day centers too are on their way. They supply a social lounge and meeting rooms, a trained person offers counsel and advice on personal problems, there is a wide range of recreational opportunity, including instruction in handicraft. Group trips are made to points of interest. In California especially these centers have become community rather than welfare sponsored. Stockton has just raised $60,000 for a new downtown building. Day centers are demonstrating that elderly persons withdrawn from life can again be interested in their world.

4. Older persons have a wide variety of individual interests. In an organization of any size this must be recognized through the voluntary setting up of subdivisions to embrace those members having a mutual concern. This may lead to a choral group, a dramatic club, a discussion group on book reviews or current events, a needlework club, or one for sports or exercise.

5. Civic activities that can be undertaken are legion, provided they are important to the welfare of the community and enough active participants can be enlisted. To mention but a few, in addition to solicitation of funds and active work for the Red Cross, Red Feather, heart, and arthritis campaigns: live-wire committees can interest the county health society in getting physicians to scale down their fees for persons of limited income, as is now recommended by the American Medical Association. The county health department or a hospital may be persuaded to set up a geriatric clinic for periodic health examinations and out-patient services at cost. Senior groups can and have conducted surveys and gathered facts regarding the economic status, health, or housing situation of the elder population. A great deal of such factual data is needed for the State conferences on aging that are to be set up in each State prior to the White House Conference on Aging in 1961.

One of the most urgent projects right now is the gathering of case material about persons who cannot accept employment without sacrificing the social security benefits to which they have contributed and which they need for subsistence. Such information will encourage the Congress to raise the present restriction on earned incomes.

A traffic safety campaign can be sparked by a senior club; this activity has special significance because of the possible trend of the States to discriminate against older drivers and require their periodic reexamination. Litterbug campaigns are sadly needed everywhere to clean up the mess of beer cans, bottles, and containers that litter our roadsides. What about the desecration of natural beauty by billboards?

6. There may be a difference of opinion as to whether senior groups should engage in outright political activity. God knows we need better government and cleaner politics. Senior groups can aid the nomination and election of topnotch candidates of proven ability and integrity. It is their right and obligation to influence legislation. On the other hand, political power wielded by seniors purely because of self-interest in larger government handouts is as suspect as are lobbies by labor, big business, or other special groups. The elder generation is deprived of some of its birthright to liberty and the pursuit of happines but should not expect special privileges from government at the expense of the rest of the population.

Too many political aspirants, largely third rate, are at work across the country trying to corral a local share of the senior vote that numbers 15 million. We need to steer clear of the rabble-rousers that promise the moon for their older constituents.

It is fascinating to conjure up the vast panorama of unfinished business on which those in the years of maturity could embark to increase their own happiness and that of their fellowmen. There is so much to be done and not too much time in which to do it. We cherish our most valuable possessions but too often admit that we are killing time: the most precious ingredient of our lives. Time is more than money. In your younger days you can use it to make (or lose) money. But even if you get together 400 millions like 92-year-old Arthur Vining Davis, you can't buy yourself any more time than he. Your cash can be stolen but nobody can steal your time. With each passing day and hour it becomes more priceless.

With increased expectancy of life, shorter working hours, and time saved because of automation and technical invention we have added 20 years to our lives. If our elders hope to use some of this added bonanza as free time in which to enjoy better living, both drones and doers will have to spend part of it in setting the stage. There's work to be done.

Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, former head of TVA, says that man has one supreme virtue—loyalty to the adventure of life. He says the one greatest treason in this high adventure, in this struggle, this search for a good way of life, is not to do the best we can. In retirement it is the quality and the purpose of life, not its quantity in time, that counts most.

Make no mistake about it. Seniors are on the move. They are going places. As Bill Dreier of Iowa says, "Why shouldn't they? They've had 65 years in the best school in the world—the university of hard knocks." The time has come when our families are not going to say, "What are we going to do about grandpa?" Instead, they will ask, "What is grandpa going to do next?"

It may be in order to close with the last few lines of Tennyson's poem Ulysses, in which that Greek hero resolves to set forth on new adventures, like those on which you are now embarking:

"Though much is taken, much abides; and though
We are not that strength which in old days
Moved heaven and earth, that which we are, we are;
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

STAGNATION, NOT INFLATION, IS GREATEST THREAT TO AMERICA

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, an editorial which I believe should be read by every American, and particularly should be read and studied by the administration, was published this morning in the Washington Post. It is entitled "The Missing Report."

So far as I have been able to read, this editorial is the most penetrating and lucid analysis yet made of the administration's economic outlook. In all candor, I must confess that the man who wrote the editorial has been able to pinpoint more succinctly than any governmental office whom I have heard, the basic weakness in leadership reflected in the President's Economic Report. I do not know who wrote the editorial, but I do commend him highly on an excellent job.

This editorial urges that governmental leadership should be more concerned with expanding production, putting more men to work, and producing more to meet unmet domestic needs and global responsibilities. He points out, rightly, I believe, that:

If it was not plain enough in the budget message, the President's Economic Report leaves little doubt that the administration has become nearly obsessed with the problem of inflation. The statistics in the report, however, strongly suggest that stagnation has for some time been the greater peril.

The report points out that our gross national product has increased by about 1 percent a year for the past 5 years, and that it will take an increase of between 4 and 5 percent a year if we are to stay ahead.

I believe that stagnation is certainly an increasing peril and it appears to me that the administration has contributed substantially to an era of stagnated thinking for a large part of the American populace. With its policies of timidity and retreat, the administration has approached the great issues of our day with the attitude that in the interest of freedom we will do what we have to do or what we can do. I think it is high time we returned to a confident, forward-looking view that the American people can do anything they set out to do, and that they glady will do whatever is necessary to defend freemen against communism or any other threat to intellectual freedom.

Mr. President, I wish to commend the great President of the great Republic to the south, Argentina, on his remarks to us in the joint meeting of the two Houses, a short while ago, particularly his remarks that the American people have shown a capacity and a will to set great goals for themselves, and have the capacity to reach them.

We have reached the point where we hear expressions like "Oh, can we do it?" We should not ask "Can we do it?" We should wrest the opportunity to do more than we have done in order to exist as a free people. That is the weakness in the thinking of the President in his budget message and in his economic report. Not "Can we do it?"—"We must do it." I for one have grown exceedingly weary of this half-whipped-dog attitude of the administration, crying that funds must be spent for space exploration, for security, for civil responsibilities, as though it dreaded to explore and expand. It is time we consider again as a government and a people that we face, not only unafraid, but with relish, the greatest challenges mankind has ever known. It is a priceless heritage which we must not risk being lost or dulled by penny-pinching satisfied fat cat economic views.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the editorial published in the Washington Post on January 21, 1959, under the heading "The Missing Report."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MISSING REPORT

If it was not plain enough in the budget message, the President's Economic Report leaves little doubt that the administration has become nearly obsessed with the problem of inflation. The statistics in the report, however, strongly suggest that stagnation has for some time been the greater peril.

Since 1953, for example, the purchasing power of a 1947–49 dollar has declined about 4 cents. In that same period, industrial production has averaged only slightly better than the 1953 level and for 3 years has shown no net gain. The annual gross national product in the same time has increased about 6 percent in real terms, or about 1 percent a year. (Even if last year's slump were overlooked, the gain would be only about 1½ percent.)

No one, certainly not this newspaper, contends that any amount of inflation is desirable. But as for growth, there is little doubt that to meet the mounting social and defense obligations of this country in the years just ahead, a rate of growth of between 4 and 5 percent is essential. One would think that a presidential report on the economy at this juncture, against such a background, would be at least as concerned with the need to set and achieve higher and specific goals for growth as with the means of doing this in terms of a stable dollar. What little has been seen so far of the President's tax and other incentives for industrial expansion suggests that the full dimensions of the problem—particularly the need to create a more adequate public framework for expanded private investment—have not been explored.

The administration's pleas for business and labor restraint on the price problem are no less important for their seemingly ineffectual and frequent repetition. The public stake in wage negotiations needs to be constantly reiterated and, by some means, more formally and forcefully expressed. But in looking at the causes of inflation, a subject about which the administration seems to have as many and varied views as the rest of us, the President tends often to ignore the under utilization of labor and plant capacity.

In place of the somewhat tiresome homilies on how we ought not to live beyond our means, or seek to run too fast, or dare to expect too much, it would be refreshing now and then to hear of a program to achieve fuller utilization of this Nation's only partially tapped potential. There is nothing inherently inflationary about putting idle men to work, or about turning the wheels of industry faster and full time. The added output is badly needed in every area of our life, both in our global responsibilities and in our unmet domestic needs.

What this country requires is a report on how to work harder and produce more before it is overwhelmed by massive population growth and urbanization at home and by competition from the Soviet Union and elsewhere abroad. Such a report has yet to be made by the Eisenhower administration.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The able Senator from Texas very appropriately calls the attention of his fellow Senators to the subject matter he has discussed. In the campaign in West Virginia in the fall of 1958, regardless of party our people generally thought that we had had too much part-time effort on the full-time problems in the United States. They felt also that, rather than have a breathing spell, which is advocated by the administration leadership, we need a frontal atack in the use of the resources of America toward a solution of those problems. I congratulate the Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for his kind words, and commend him for the leadership he is already showing in the Senate in the brief time he has been a Member of the Senate. I wish to associate myself with him in the wonderful tribute he paid this morning to Stonewall Jackson, the nearest to a military genius the American people have produced. General Jackson never took the half-whipped-dog attitude. He never said, "I do not have enough men. I do not have enough guns." He used what he had. He turned the flanks and defeated his enemy. That is the kind of attitude we need in Washington. All of us can take courage from Stonewall Jackson. He never had enough with which to fight. However, he never said, as many generals on both sides in the Civil War said, in so many words, "I haven't got enough to do anything with." He did things while other generals with superior forces and more guns merely said, "I do not have enough to do it with." That is the administration's attitude. It says, "We haven't got enough. It is too hard on us. We cannot do it. We cannot afford it." That is not the attitude of leadership. I do not know what to call it or how to describe it. I believe that the Washington Post has done a great service to the country this morning in pinpointing it first, before anyone in the Government has.

TRIBUTE TO LESLIE L. BIFFLE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, for more than 25 years I have enjoyed and cherished the friendship of Leslie L. Biffle. Les was the secretary of the majority and later the Secretary of the Senate.

Last evening, hundreds of his friends and colleagues gave an appropriate testimonial dinner to Mr. Biffle in Washington. Senators LYNDON JOHNSON, STYLES BRIDGES, and LISTER HILL were among those who expressed appreciation for the fine public service of Les Biffle. A previous commitment precluded my being present, but my tribute to Leslie Biffle is contained in a letter which I sent to him under date of January 19, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 19, 1959.

Hon. LESLIE L. BIFFLE,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR LES: A long-standing speaking engagement in Dallas, Tex., before the annual convention of the American Road Builders Association prevents me from sharing personally in the testimonial dinner in your honor on January 20. But I cannot allow this happy occasion to pass without an acknowledgment on my part.

Perhaps the most eloquent evidence of the quality of your friendship and your dedication to the values of a free society is the wide diversity of political opinions of those who claim you as friend and colleague. This cross section speaks clearly of your capacity to treat men and women as people rather than partisans, and to divorce the personal from the political.

This is the capacity to which Emerson referred when he stated that, "A friend is a person with whom I may be sincere. Before him I may think aloud. I am arrived at last in the presence of a man so real and equal, that I may drop even those garments of dissimulation, courtesy, and second thought, which men never put off, and may deal with him with the simplicity and wholeness with which one chemical atom meets another."

Though absent tonight, I am delighted that Mary is present, and I rejoice with you and Glade (glad she is from West Virginia) in the festivities in which you both share and which you both so righly deserve.

Yours sincerely,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, in accordance with the previous order, I move that the Senate now adjourn until noon on Friday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate the Chair appoints as members of the committee of escort the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

The Doorkeeper announced the following guests, who entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them:

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

The members of the President's Cabinet.

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m. the Doorkeeper announced His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic.

His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and stood at the Clerk's desk. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, it is my great pleasure to say to you that we have a guest, a neighbor from the South, a representative of a free and a friendly people. We are happy that he has come to visit us, because we believe that in such times as those in which we live the Americas must have an understanding and stand together.

It is my privilege and a great honor to present to you the President of the Argentine Republic.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

ADDRESS OF HIS EXCELLENCY ARTURO FRONDIZI, PRESIDENT OF THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC

I

President FRONDIZI. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, and Members of the Congress, I am deeply grateful for the cordial words with which my presence has been greeted here in this Congress, an institution that symbolizes the democratic ideals of the American Hemisphere. On behalf of the Argentine Nation, I greet the representatives of the people of the United States. It is the fraternal greeting of a country geographically remote, but spiritually linked to your own by the ties of an historical friendship and by the common ideals that are the heritage of the whole hemisphere.

This is the first time an Argentine President visited the United States, but we have so much in common that I cannot feel an alien on your soil, but, instead, a member, together with the millions that inhabit this great country, of that lofty human experience which is known as the community of American Republics. [Applause.]

And even less alien within these walls can someone feel when, like myself, he has been a legislator in his own country. I pay tribute in the Congress of the United States to the fundamental institution of the democratic system, to the institution that expresses the ideals and the interests of the people and, wherever it has been able to operate in freedom, has been the bulwark of the rights of man.

As President of the Argentine Nation, I am pleased to point out the similarities that unite our two countries. Our political organization is the same, and our system of federal government is also similar. As is the case in your own country, Argentina is ruled by a Government with limited authority, where the exercise of power finds an insurmountable barrier in the rights of those who are governed. [Applause.]

These similarities are the reflection of a deeper and longstanding identification. Let me remind you that the United States recognized Argentina's independence in 1822. Therefore, it was one of the first countries to do so. Let me recall as well a significant fact that public education received a powerful impulse in my country when, nearly one century ago, Sarmiento, who lived in the United States, returned to Argentina to assume the Presidency of his country.

With the passing of the years, it seems as if history had wished to strengthen these similarities. Our two countries not only bear the stamp of national independence, individual freedom, and the enormous enterprise of democratic government. They have also shown identical capacity to assimilate universal culture, and equal pride to defend their sovereignty and self-determination at all times and under any circumstances. [Applause.]

Just as in the case of the United States, the sparsely populated Argentine land received substantial immigration currents from Europe. Our rich plains were covered by wheat and cattle; towns and cities were built, joined by the longest railway network in Latin America, and an industry began to grow, an industry of which today my country is proud.

The miracle of America also took place on our soil; men and women coming from every latitude, speaking different languages and professing different creeds, felt free and as brothers in a new fatherland. This wonderful American phenomenon, unique in the history of the world, is, precisely, the fundamental reason for the oneness of the countries of this hemisphere, and does not stem either from pacts or from circumstantial interests.

The root of America's unity is a spiritual root. This continent was born to history as the land of hope and freedom. Our ancestors foresaw that the full life of man would materialize in America, without oppression, unfairness, or persecution. This is why all the great American deeds have always been the deeds of freedom. This is why the military heroes of our continental independence have been statesmen, and history does not remember them as conquerors but rather as liberators.

The American ideal of democracy, justice, and freedom has been fruitful because it is based on a spiritual concept of man. In keeping with these principles, the American peoples reject any materialistic concept of life and any totalitarian concept of the State. The human being is for us a sacred being, and his rights are as sacred as the institutions that protect his freedom. Our concept of the spirit as the driving force of man and of history is the fundamental reason why it is impossible for us, the sons of this Hemisphere, to be Communists. Our respect for the essential dignity of man also leads us to the rejection of any type of dictatorship or of any antidemocratic ideological influence. [Applause.]

The American Continent is a community of nations united by geographical facts, by history and by a spiritual identity. Precisely because they believe that the destiny of man is a spiritual destiny, the peoples of this hemisphere belong, from the historical viewpoint, to the cultural world of the West, where the principles of human dignity and universal brotherhood were born. Hence, the Western World is not for the American peoples a source of conflicts or antagonisms. On the contrary, because they belong to the Western World, the peoples of the American Hemisphere know that they are members of the universal community of peoples and serve the cause of the Americas because they consider it to be the cause of all mankind. [Applause.]

II

We believe that spiritual strength is the motive force of history and we proclaim the essential unity of the Americas, but these statements cannot blind us to the fact, painful but real, that the development of this hemisphere is not the same everywhere. We cannot ignore the harsh fact that millions of beings in Latin America suffer from misery and backwardness. And we cannot deny that, under these social and economic conditions in open contradiction with our ideals of justice and freedom, the life of the spirit is impossible. Peoples that are poor and without hope are not free peoples. A stagnant and impoverished country cannot uphold democratic institutions. On the contrary, it is fertile soil for anarchy and dictatorship. This is not a theoretical conclusion but the undeniable evidence of facts recorded by the history lived by the Latin American peoples. Contrary to what many people suppose, political instability and social unrest are not the causes but rather the effects of the spiritual and material conditions under which millions of men and women are struggling, doomed to a life without hope or well-being. [Applause.]

This means that the ideals embodied by the American hemisphere are not yet a reality for all of its sons. If it is our wish to achieve the destiny dreamt of by our ancestors, that is, to make of America an effective moral power in the world, our first duty, as Americans, is to make these ideals a reality in our own countries. In order to defend, not only with conviction but also with true effectiveness, the cause of freedom, of law, and of democracy throughout the world, we must assure the rule of freedom, of law, and of democracy in the entire American Continent. In other words, we have to lay the firm bases and create the adequate conditions that will make possible the full rule of human rights as well as the stability and the permanence of the democratic institutions of our countries.

Without national development there can be no welfare or progress. When there is misery and backwardness in a country not only freedom and democracy are doomed but even national sovereignty is in jeopardy. The Latin American peoples must face this truth, and attack the very roots of the evil. To this end, they must change an economic structure that has become a factor of stagnation and poverty. Our countries must decide, therefore, to make use of all their resources, to mobilize all the available energy, and to take advantage of all the technical and scientific progress of our time.

The immense natural wealth of Latin America must be tapped and used in benefit of all its inhabitants. Latin America must stop producing only raw materials. It will have to set up its own heavy industry, its petrochemical industry, its factories of machinery. It will have to build hydroelectrical stations and nuclear reactors. It will have to mechanize rural establishments and provide them with the necessary electric power in order to increase production and raise the standard of living of the rural family. Summing up, it will have to carry out the same process of expansion and integration of domestic economy which has led the United States to its present and magnificent level of development.

This is the task in which the Argentine Republic is now engaged. We are firmly determined to further our full economic development. And we will do this on the basis of our great natural resources, as yet but poorly developed, and on the basis of our national effort. But the economic chaos we have endured for long years has decapitalized our country. Our lack of development in a highly industrialized world has caused us serious harm. Our raw material is selling at steadily lower prices while the price of fuel, equipment, and manufactured goods, so urgently needed in our country, is constantly rising. This has caused serious deficits in our balance of payments and has made it impossible for us to take care of basic investments with our own resources.

In consequence, we have taken as the starting point of our program of economic expansion, the promotion of our national production of iron and steel, oil, and coal, which are found in abundance in our country, and we have requested the cooperation of foreign capital.

Foreign credit and investment find in the Argentine Republic the same juridical guarantees granted by any democratic country. They will find, furthermore, a hard-working and enterprising people, as well as highly skilled labor. Ours is a people full of national pride, ready to defend with zeal the sovereignty of their country. Our people will accept any investment devoted to the promotion of the welfare and progress of the country, but will reject any proposal implying a threat to its sovereignty.

Foreign capital will also find in Argentina a government waging a battle without quarter against inflation. The program of economic and financial stabilization we have just launched tends, precisely, to eliminate all the inflationary factors which have affected our country for so many years. The goal of this program is to establish, by means of a sound currency and an economy free from unnecessary regulations, the solid bases of a development without regressions or ups and downs, driven onward by the force of private initiative, fully supported in its creative function.

III

The effort my country has now undertaken is the beginning of an integral effort but recently begun in Latin America; its success or its failure will have a decisive influence on the policies of the hemisphere. Sister nations may profit from the Argentine experience and may stimulate the energy as yet latent in all Latin America. It will be an epic of peace and work that will result in spiritual plenitude and material wealth. It will be the true epic of democracy, because that plenitude and wealth will benefit millions of men and women, will be transformed into cultural resources and will make worthier, freer, and fairer the life of human beings under the skies of the American Continent.

The example of your country will encourage us when facing the task we have before us. The economic history of the United States shows, in fact, that peoples that set themselves national goals and spare no effort to further their integral development one day become great nations. [Applause.]

The farseeing men who placed your country on the road of its present greatness did not yield to easy temptations or retreat in the face of the difficulties that arise whenever a country decides to build its destiny with its own hands.

This is the lesson that Latin America will learn and will turn into spiritual and material wealth for almost 200 million human beings. It is a problem that fundamentally pertains to us, the Latin Americans, but from which the United States cannot stand aloof. You cannot remain indifferent to the fact that millions of individuals lead a life of hardship in the American Continent. The situation of these fellow human beings is not only a challenge to our common ideals of human solidarity, but is also a source of danger to the security of the hemisphere. To leave an American country in stagnation is as dangerous as an attack coming from an extra-continental power. The struggle against the underdevelopment of peoples demands a solidarity far greater than is required by their political or military defense. The true defense of the hemisphere is the elimination of the causes that beget misery, injustice, and cultural backwardness. When all the Latin American countries are granted access to the benefits of spiritual and material improvement they will defend the American soil and institutions with all the passion, the energy, and the courage with which life itself is defended. [Applause.] Because they will be defending what rightly belongs to them, what they have created through their own effort. They will be defending a high and fair standard of living and the possibility of obtaining increasingly better conditions of well-being.

It is with personal satisfaction that I tell you, as representatives of the people of the United States, that your country has fully understood its role in this hour of America. Argentina has just been granted important credits by the Government and private institutions of the United States. This cooperation means for us something far more important than support for the program of national expansion we have just undertaken. It is a positive and fundamental step toward the materialization of the ideals of cooperation throughout the American Continent. It is the evidence that the hour of concrete decisions has come. That hour finds us all, the Americans of the entire Americas, united by the same solidarity, the same confidence, and the same hope that made of this hemisphere a community of sovereign republics. [Applause.]

Our efforts will determine whether this will be another hour of glory for America. With the same firmness, the same courage, and the same decision with which our forefathers forged the independence of our countries, let us get ready to forge their full spiritual and material development.

With our moral strength, with our material effort, and with the help of God, let us do our duties and be worthy of the historical inheritance we have received.

Let us make the American Continent the continent of human hope, realizing on its soil and for all its sons the promise of happiness and fulfillment America offered to mankind. [Applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p.m. His Excellency the President of Argentina, accompanied by the committee of escort, retired from the Chamber.

The Doorkeeper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order:

The members of the President's Cabinet.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

JOINT MEETING DISSOLVED

The SPEAKER. The purposes of the joint meeting having been completed, the Chair declares the joint meeting of the two Houses now dissolved.

Thereupon (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the joint meeting of the two Houses was dissolved.

The Members of the Senate retired to their Chamber.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 1 o'clock and 17 minutes p.m.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS HAD DURING THE RECESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the proceedings that took place during the recess be printed in the RECORD.

The motion was agreed to.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from a committee:

JANUARY 20, 1959.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Because my duties on the Joint Atomic Energy Committee will make it impossible for me to continue serving on the Government Operations Committee, I would like to tender my resignation effective today.

It has been a privilege and a pleasure to work with the members of the Government Operations Committee and I regret that I must discontinue this association.

Sincerely yours,

JACK WESTLAND,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

JOINT CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON GROWTH AND EXPANSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 172, 85th Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the Joint Congressional Committee To Investigate Matters Pertaining to the Growth and Expansion of the District of Columbia and its Metropolitan Area the following members on the part of the House: Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, and Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia.

GOVERNOR EGAN OF ALASKA

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I know that the Members of the House, especially those who were here during the 85th Congress when we passed the Alaska statehood bill, will share my feeling of concern and regret at the news that Governor Egan of Alaska is critically ill.

As a "Tennessee" representative during the consideration of the statehood bill, Bill Egan won the respect of everyone with whom he came in contact. While I am a Republican and he is a Democrat, nevertheless my regard for his ability was such that I have looked to Bill Egan as one of the contributing reasons for hope that the new State will get off to a good start.

Economically, Alaska is faced with difficult problems, and especially in view of the fact that her principal industry and so-called "cash crop" is her fisheries resources. Owing to the refusal of the Japanese fishing fleet to conform to conservation this resource is sadly depleted and especially this year the great Bristol Bay district may be closed.

I had written to wish Bill Egan well as Governor, and to assure him of my cooperation and support. Now I can only express the deep and sincere hope that he recovers, and speedily. Alaska needs him.

TRADE WITH RUSSIA

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, as he leaves our shores, it would be a fatal mistake for Moscow or Washington to interpret the flattery and fawning reception given Soviet Deputy Premier Anastas Mikoyan by the exclusive clubs in Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, San Francisco, and Wall Street as the attitude of the overwhelming majority of Americans toward this high-ranking Communist and what he represents.

It is now apparent that at the outset Mikoyan misrepresented the nature and purpose of his visit. It is clear that this "mission from Moscow" instead of being a casual, holiday visit with his good friend, the wily Russian Ambassador, as Mikoyan stated on his visa application, was actually a cleverly planned, direct approach to top American businessmen. He wanted to convert them, as Constantine Brown says, "to the idea of coexistence through large credits for exports of American factory tools and special equipment to the U.S.S.R."

If he could sell those who are always interested primarily in dollars, even though it means supplying the Soviets with stuff that someday might be shot back at American boys, these businessmen would then put the pressure on Mr. Dulles to succumb to this coexistence the Communists have been propagandizing about.

Russia, which has drained itself to build its colossal war machine, badly needs some basic materials and consumer goods. We are spending $40 billion a year—60 percent of our budget—in an attempt to keep even in the armament race. It is obvious that, if we supply the Soviets with consumer goods—on credit at that—we will enable them to build a greater striking power which we will then have to meet. How silly can we get?

Those who have vied for invitations to the exclusive parties given for Mikoyan from coast to coast evidently have been so busy in their ivory towers or their memories are so short that they are unaware of the record of treachery and deceit which this man Mikoyan and his fellow conspirators have written on the pages of history in the last generation or so.

Khrushchev, who knows Mikoyan perhaps better than anyone else, should have given them an insight into the man to whom they listen with such rapt attention. At a party given at the Kremlin in May 1956, Khrushchev called Mikoyan "a professional traitor" to his face.

I am sure these same leaders in America would not have extended such a warm welcome to the Nazi leaders when they were bent upon world domination, when they were ruthlessly destroying human lives. Nevertheless some of us have sat in rapt attention while the shrewd and personable Mr. Mikoyan told us about the need and the sincere desire of the Kremlin hierarchy for coexistence and all that it implies.

They forgot or never knew that Khrushchev, who sent Mikoyan on this American errand, said within the last year something quite different about coexistence with the capitalistic world.

Of course—

Said Khrushchev—

we must recognize that we cannot coexist externally. One of us must go to his grave. We do not want to go to the grave. They (the Western powers) don't want to go to their graves, either. So what must be done? We must push them to their graves.

These good people forgot or never knew that Khrushchev during the last 6 months said to the foreign diplomats, including our American Ambassador:

We will beat the capitalists, but that does not mean killing anybody. * * * When we win in this competition, we will also reeducate you. We Bolsheviks are a ravenous people. What we achieved in the past is very little. We want more and more.

They forgot, or never knew, what was said by Dimitri Z. Manuilsky when he was instructor in the Lenin School of Political Warfare. Manuilsky said:

War to the hilt between communism and capitalism is inevitable. To win we shall need the element of surprise. The bourgeoisie will have to be put to sleep, so we shall begin by launching the most spectacular peace movement on record. There will be electrifying overtures and unheard of concessions. The capitalist countries, stupid and decadent, will rejoice to cooperate in their own destruction. They will leap at another chance to be friends. As soon as their guard is down, we shall smash them with our clenched fist.

I am sure, if they did not remember these things, which are well known to those of us who have studied the operations and machinations of this world-wide Communist conspiracy, that they were also slightly hazy about the man Mikoyan, himself, and what he has done. It is my firm conviction that, even though some leaders in our Government, business, and social circles are insensible to the record, the rank and file of American people have not been fooled.

They know that it was Mikoyan who was the conveyor of the message of truce from the Kremlin under which the Hungarian partiots were deceived into a phony peace conference from which they were dragged to be shot.

The American people know that, even while Mikoyan is calling for peaceful coexistence, Communist spies, working out of the Russian Embassy and consulates, by blackmail and terror attempt to gain access to our vital defense secrets.

The Soviet Empire, which has entered into more than a thousand treaties, agreements, and nonaggression pacts in the short span of its 40 years of existence, has flagrantly violated every one of them that it decided was not to its best interests in its drive for world domination.

The President, in his state of the Union message to Congress last Friday, said:

We have learned the bitter lesson that international agreements, historically considered by us as sacred, are regarded in Communist doctrine and in practice to be mere scraps of paper. * * * As a consequence, we can have no confidence in any treaty to which Communists are a party except where such a treaty provides within itself for self-enforcing mechanisms.

If there are still any "doubting Thomases," I suggest they take a look at the January 16 issue of U.S. News & World Report and read the article on page 65 entitled "Can You Really Do Business With Russia?"

WASHINGTON NEWSPAPER REFUSES TO PUBLISH PUTNAM LETTER AS PAID ADVERTISEMENT

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, as you know, I asked and received unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on Saturday last, a letter from Mr. Carleton Putnam to the President of the United States on the vitally important issue of segregation.

Mr. Putnam, an outstanding American businessman, is not a southerner; he is of an old New England family, is a native of New York, and a graduate of Princeton and Columbia Universities. However, his letter presents so completely and so eloquently that position long held by the South on this issue, that it has received wide publicity in our section of the country, being reprinted in practically all southern newspapers.

In fact, it was so refreshing to find that what has been considered to be the partisan southern view on the segregation question was being masterfully proclaimed by one who was not, as I have pointed out, a born southerner, that a group of outstanding citizens of Birmingham, in my district, has made an effort to have this letter published throughout the country.

Many newspapers, following the hallowed tradition of printing whatever is the news, regardless of whether it supports the established policies of their editors and publishers, printed the letter, or news of the letter, for exactly what it is—a candid statement on a crucial issue by an outstanding individual, or in other words, news.

In those localities where the press did not see fit to run the story either as a news item or as a "letter to the editor," this group of outstanding southern citizens bought space in some of the larger, more widely circulated daily journals, and ran the letter as an advertisement—a procedure which is nothing more than a natural manifestation of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. This was done in the New York Times, for instance.

I now come to my point, Mr. Speaker.

When the Washington Post was approached on this matter, they did not consider the item newsworthy. This, of course, was their privilege. They refused to run Mr. Putnam's letter as a "letter to the editor," which again was their privilege, though refusal to present but one side of a controversial issue shows an appalling and disturbing lack of objectivity on their part.

Then, Mr. Speaker, when this group of citizens, through their representative, asked to buy space in the Post in order to run the Putnam letter as a paid advertisement, they were flatly refused.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this attitude, this refusal, is a flagrant violation of our most sacred tenet, freedom of expression. I protest most vigorously, as must all Americans who hold this principle to be meaningful to us and essential to the preservation of the American way of life, this affront to the South, this insult to liberty, this wholly indefensible position.

Those of us who are familiar with the policies of the Washington Post in its handling of the news may not be surprised at this gross betrayal of responsible journalism. But I deplore and resent bitterly this insult and lack of consideration for the views of my constituents.

THE LATE CECIL B. DE MILLE

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I have just learned with deep sorrow of the passing of Cecil B. de Mille, the famous motion picture director, who was also a great American and a great Californian.

Mr. de Mille's death takes from our national scene one of those few gifted enough to give—in entertainment form—a panoramic view of the great events of history. His contribution to our national life and the enrichment which he brought to many Americans will be his lasting memorial.

IN MEMORY OF REPRESENTATIVE HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, "one of the best liked men in Congress because of his kindness and his friendliness."

That was epitaph expressed by his colleagues and by members of the working press, when the newspapers reported after the adjournment of the 85th Congress, that Representative Herman P. Eberharter, who represented the 28th District of Pennsylvania, had passed to his reward.

During his 22 years of service in the House of Representatives, he had acquired a rich background of knowledge and experience as a result of his hard work as a member of various committees. Few men in the history of Congress could match his broad grasp of national problems, or his devotion to details. Those of us who sought his advice, could always depend upon a fair and factual answer. Herman would always consider both sides of a question, carefully and scrupulously, but once having made up his mind and having stated the reasons for his stand, no one could question his integrity.

Even to those who disagreed with him, he was ever a gentleman.

Illnesses which would have discouraged many men, never weakened his spirit. With the aid of a cane, he insisted on carrying out his responsibilities as a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee where he was an expert on social security, the tax problems of small business, and the complexities of trade and tariff.

If ever a man loved his work and found fulfillment in it, with never a thought of relaxation or retirement, that man was Herman Eberharter.

He was seeking reelection for a 12th term, when death interposed and, taking him by the hand, whispered, "The time has come to rest."

To his survivors, Herman P., Jr., and James J. Eberharter, we extend the sympathy of his colleagues in the House of Representatives, who held their father in high esteem. He gave distinguished service to the people of his district and to the Nation. No human being could do more to help others.

As time reconciles us to the loss of those who were close to us in this life, we treasure even more the sweet memories of them that can never be taken from us.

They will always be heart-warming as we think of our late colleague and friend, Representative Herman P. Eberharter.

NATIONAL JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT WEEK

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, which has been screened with the leadership.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it was the initiative, the sense of individual dignity, and the determination to mold their own futures that motivated those who founded this Nation; and

Whereas Junior Achievement, Inc., through its learning-by-doing program, is inculcating those ideals in American youth by helping them to set up and operate their own small-scale business enterprises; and

Whereas their experience in running Junior Achievement companies will provide these young people wtih a heightened understanding of the privileges and duties of citizenship and better prepare them to assume the responsibilities of community leadership; and

Whereas thousands of American businessmen voluntarily give unstintingly of their time, their counsel, and their experience for the benefit of the members of Junior Achievement; and

Whereas it is understood that the week beginning January 25, 1959, and ending January 31, 1959, will be observed as National Junior Achievement Week: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 25, 1959, through January 31, 1959, as National Junior Achievement Week and urging all citizens of our country to salute the activities of Junior Achievers and their volunteer adult advisers through appropriate ceremonies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REVISION OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TELLER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing a bill today which I first introduced in the 85th Congress, to repeal the discriminatory provision in the Social Security Act which now denies coverage to about 2 million employees of the Federal Government. I should like to make it perfectly clear that this bill will not affect, in any manner, the benefit rights that Federal employees now have under their existing retirement systems. Each employee now within the purview of my bill will have the right to decide whether or not he wishes the additional protection of the social security system.

We have prided ourselves in this country on the growth of our social security system. When the law was first passed, only 6 out of every 10 workers were covered. Now 9 out of 10 workers are covered, and, if my bill is enacted, we could truly say that we have a universal system.

Today about 16 million Americans enjoy substantial security for themselves and for their families because they have the protection of both social security and a private pension plan. Likewise, about 2 million working men and women are covered under social security and also under a State or local retirement system. And over 2½ million servicemen are accruing credits toward benefits both under their respective military retirement systems and under social security.

Here is the confusing story of the patchwork way in which social security affects employees of Federal, State, and local governments today. It begins in 1950, because, prior to that time, no Federal, State, or local employees received social security credit on the basis of their Government service. The 1950 amendments, however, brought in approximately 100,000 Federal employees who were not included in a Federal retirement system, and also covered employees of such Federal instrumentalities as the Federal credit union, the Federal Reserve banks, national banks, national farm-loan associations and other instrumentalities, even though they might have a retirement system of their own. Similarly, coverage was authorized in 1950 for State and local employees who were not under retirement systems, but this latter exclusion of retirement-system members was removed in 1954 so that almost all State and local employees are now potentially eligible for social security protection. The 1954 amendments also brought in some 150,000 employees of the Federal Government, including temporary employees in the field service of the post office and temporary census takers of the Bureau of the Census. Finally, in 1956, coverage was extended to members of the Armed Forces, members of the retirement system of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and other State and local employees under retirement systems who had previously been excluded by various technicalities of the law.

The bill I have introduced today will provide coverage, on an elective basis, to all officers and employees of the United States and its instrumentalities not previously under the social security system. This means that members of the civil service retirement system will have the opportunity to obtain the additional protection provided by social security. Coverage will also be available for members of the Foreign Service retirement system, of the retirement system for the policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia, as well as for the members of various retirement systems of the Federal judiciary and those of such Federal instrumentalities as the Federal home-loan banks and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. My bill means that all Federal employees will be getting social security credits if they earn $50 or more within a 3-month calendar quarter of the year.

The method of adding social security protection on top without change in the status of the benefit structure of an employee's existing retirement system is not at all unique. The great majority of the State and local retirement systems which have voted to come under social security have done so in just this manner. Congress also adopted this approach when it extended coverage to members of the Armed Forces under the Servicemen's and Veterans' Survivor Benefits Act of 1956.

My bill would use the so-called two-division approach, which Congress instituted when it authorized coverage for certain State and local employees, including those of my own State of New York, in the 1956 amendments. According to this plan members of retirement systems would be separated into two divisions: One division to be composed of members who desire social security coverage and the other of members who do not want it. Individuals who are employed by the Federal Government after the date of enactment will be put in the division which is under social security. This is a precautionary measure to avoid adverse selection of risks and preserve the financial integrity of the social security trust fund.

I believe that the enactment of my bill is necessary for a number of reasons. First of all, as I have said previously, this legislation will terminate the discriminatory exclusions from social security—which do not apply to workers in private industry or to employees of State and local government—and give all Federal workers the opportunity for social security coverage even though they are under another retirement system.

Secondly, it will eliminate the great inequities which arise when employees go into Federal service from private industry or any other covered employment. Take the case of a young secretary who has been employed 8 years in an insurance company and then enters Government service as a career employee. She stands to lose all of the money she has paid into the social security fund, without hope of benefit or refund, because she does not have the 10 years normally required for fully insured status under social security. And even if she had worked for the required 10 years, the amount of the benefit she will receive when she retires will suffer ccrrosion because she is not covered by social security in her Government job. Or to give a case of even more blatant inequity, consider the young father of 3 children who enters Government service but dies before he has the requisite 5 years of coverage under the civil service system, and is also unfortunate enough to have lost his insured status under social security. His family is indeed in desperate straits because he died while he was in this coverage vacuum.

Finally, my bill will be of particular value to the short-term Federal worker who, for one reason or another, leaves Government service. If he has less than 5 years in Government he will have no benefit entitlement at all and, even if he has this minimum entitlement, his payment will be extremely low inasmuch as civil service benefits are heavily weighted on the basis of length of service.

These are just a few examples of the compelling need for the kind of legislation I am proposing. I recognize that, in the past, there have been objections on the part of some Federal workers to proposals which would integrate Federal retirement systems with social security, because they feared that they would lose some of their existing benefit rights. My bill meets this objection with a new approach. It makes no change whatsoever in either existing system, except to make it possible for those people who wish the additional protection of social security to take full advantage of both.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the 85th Congress, of which I was a Member, passed a Trade Agreements Extension Act under which the power of the President to enter into further trade agreements was extended for a 4-year period. He was empowered to reduce our tariffs another 20 percent.

Mr. Speaker, in passing the legislation in this form, Congress did not meet the problem of import competition that has confronted many of our industries in recent years. It swept this problem under the rug and it is therefore still with us. It is still with us, not in diminished form, but in a more pressing form than before; and all indications are that the problem will increase rather than decline.

This is only natural, first, because we have sent billions of dollars' worth of modern machinery and equipment overseas in the past 10 years; second, productivity in other industrial countries has increased as a result not only of the installation of laborsaving machinery received from this country but from technological improvements of their own; third, thousands of productivity teams from other countries have toured our factories and studied our methods; and fourth, as a result, many of the competitive advantages that we may at one time have enjoyed have disappeared and have turned into disadvantages.

In the meantime, we have continued to reduce our tariffs. Our prices have risen with respect to an increasing number of products to the point of threatening to price ourselves out of world markets.

As a result, many manufacturers are establishing plants overseas, both as a means of supplying oversea markets and, in some instances, as a means of competing in this country, as witness the automobile industry.

This trend will grow with the establishment of the European Common Market. Many workers who otherwise would be employed in this country will find it more difficult to obtain jobs. The products of American factories established abroad will be sold here. These products, themselves, will not be manufactured here. The materials going into them also will, in most cases, not be produced here, whether this will be steel, glass, copper, aluminum, paint, or rubber, as in the case of automobiles, or something else. The result will be to bypass our labor no less than domestic suppliers of such materials. The profits that otherwise would be realized through manufacturing here will be slow coming back. Our Government will lose the taxes that it otherwise would collect.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a pleasing prospect.

Coal miners will continue to lose jobs or fail to find new ones because of the importation of residual fuel oil. Mine operators will fare no better.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the trade agreements program has been sold to the American public on the grounds that it would not be allowed to injure domestic industry. It will interest Members to know how extensively assurances to this effect have been uttered to the American people by our Presidents, Secretaries of State, and other executive officials over the years. I, myself, have been amazed at the record of the past 25 years on this point.

The Congress, through statements made to and before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and Finance Committee of the Senate, no less than through letters to the congressional leadership, has been told repeatedly in tones of complete sincerity that great care would be exercised to avoid injury through tariff reductions and that if such injury did occur a sure remedy was available in the escape clause.

We have been told not once but many times that if mistakes in tariff reductions should result in injury or if injury occurred as a result of unforeseen developments, we would be free to withdraw or modify the duty reduction to the extent necessary to remedy the injury.

Mr. Speaker, it is a sad commentary to read this record alongside of what has actually happened in the administration of the escape clause. In the past 10 years the President has put into effect less than half of the Tariff Commission's recommendations and has refused to follow the Commission's unanimous findings of serious injury in seven cases.

Industry has become greatly discouraged over this record. The tightening amendments enacted by Congress from time to time have been all but ignored.

Mr. Speaker, I shall undertake to give you a review of the record of assurances given to the Congress beginning with 1934 when the Trade Act was first passed.

I am deeply indebted to Mr. O. R. Strackbein, chairman of the Nation-Wide Committee on Import-Export Policy, for extensive researches that he has made into this subject. Much of the material that I will present has been made available through his efforts.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I understood you to say just a moment ago that that program has been sold to the American people on the ground and on the theory that it would not be permitted to hurt our own folks and our own industries.

Mr. BAILEY. That is exactly right.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, it does, does it not?

Mr. BAILEY. It does and that is why I am speaking here today and why I am proposing to advise the Members of Congress and particularly the 70-some new Members coming in here that they cannot swallow those trade policies because there is so much that needs to be done if we are to continue to operate our industries in this country and to maintain a stable economy.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then, perhaps, you will explain to me why it is, for example, that some of these labor organizations are in favor of our receiving exports from abroad and furnishing them money with which to build plants over there and, yet, they are in direct competition, for example, not only in the motor industry but in many others. For example, in my own district with respect to wire, there is wire coming in from abroad which is driving our product off the market causing unemployment in two or three cities. Yet, we have people on our side and I do not know what they are doing on your side, but they are all in favor of this reciprocal trade business. How can the CIO and the labor organizations favor it, if you know?

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that it is true the CIO and the A.F. of L. have up to the present time been somewhat ardent in their support of these trade programs, and I will say further to the gentleman that that opinion was made up and that course steered before this past year when there were imported into this country some 300,000 foreign-made automobiles. I understand that probably may reach as much as half a million cars this year. I am sure that these groups will not be able to maintain their present position as favorable to reciprocal trade because of the situation that has developed.

I would like to say also that the gentleman should be a little more definite. Many labor organizations are bitterly opposed to our present trade policies. I cannot conceive of the United Mine Workers being for reciprocal trade.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. But they do not make automobiles.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, they do not make automobiles. We do not have any coal to mine, beause we do not have a market.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I want to express my appreciation for the information which the gentleman is giving us. It applies not only to his own district, but I know it does to my own district, the Fourth District of Michigan, and I am certain it does in Detroit where there is so much unemployment. Why they want to go along with a policy when the net result is the importation of these other cars in competition with their market, I cannot figure out.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. EVINS. We have just heard the very excellent speech by one of our good South American neighbors the President of Argentina, Dr. Arturo Frondizi. This seems to me to be an untimely moment to attack the cornerstone of our good neighbor policy—the reciprocal trade program. Those who would throttle the reciprocal trade program which was initiated by my predecessor, Cordell Hull, would do a great disservice to the people of our Nation not only in the matter of good will, but in material benefits. We know the position of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] who has always opposed the reciprocal trade program. I feel I would be remiss in my duty as the successor to Cordell Hull, the author of such a program, if I did not record a protest to the gentleman's talk on the program today. There may be cases where we should make adjustments, but in view of world conditions, and for the further and continued development of industry in our own country the reciprocal trade program should not be defeated.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish the gentleman would be a little more specific. Never have I, in addressing the House or appearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the Congress, failed to make it clear that I am not opposed to the idea of reciprocal trade. All I have been trying to do is to throw greater safeguards around the industries of America so that we may maintain a stable economy and assume our responsibility of world leadership. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Tennessee is wrong. I would like to say to him that the time has come when we cannot live in the reflected glory of Cordell Hull. Even if he were the predecessor of the gentleman from Tennessee. That was 30 years ago. Conditions now are quite different from what they were at that time. However, I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS] that this was supposed to be a reciprocal trade agreement. It is no longer reciprocal. It is a one-way street, in which the American producer is doing all of the giving and somebody else is doing all of the receiving. To get up here and say that he was for a trade policy just because somebody from his State advocated it 30 years ago would be just as sensible as for me to say that I wanted to put into effect a policy similar to that advocated by my predecessor from West Virginia along about 1890 when he wrote the tariff laws of that time.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I take it from what you said about Cordell Hull, and we all respect and admire him, you think that jobs, something to eat, and something to wear, are more important to your people today than something that was carried on a few years ago.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. You want to look after your folks, do you not?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly. I agree with the gentleman. If you will look at the President's budget message you find $389 million in gold reserves and he is proposing to transfer $344 million of that over to the Export-Import Bank for loans to foreign countries. That is what is going on. American capital is going abroad to exploit the free labor in the other countries and manufacturing products to bring into this country under the reciprocal trade agreements, taking away the jobs of American workmen. Then a gentleman would rise and say that that is all right. Maybe it was 30 years ago when Cordell Hull originated the trade agreements, but it is not now and we cannot continue to follow this policy unless we throw some safeguards around our basic industries.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. The gentleman from Tennessee referred to Secretary of State Hull. His policy and the reciprocal trade agreements at that time were based on the fact we were coming out of an economic situation. Mr. Hull himself advocated this only as a temporary policy and not as a permanent thing which has been brought about by the action of this House.

Mr. BAILEY. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio that not only did Mr. Hull advocate it as a temporary measure, but he made the statement before the Committee on Ways and Means, which I am including in this article I am inserting in the RECORD, that in no case should it be permitted to injure domestic industry. I would like to go ahead and say, too, that I have quotations from President Truman, in addition to Secretary of State Hull, from President Roosevelt, and from the present President, Mr. Eisenhower, assuring the American people that this trade policy would not be permitted to injure American industry.

The principal difficulty of our tariff and trade legislation during the past decade has centered in the rising conflict between the Congress and the President. The controversy has raged over the power, on the one hand, of regulating our foreign commerce and shaping the tariff, which is vested in the Congress by the Constitution, and the power, on the other, to conduct foreign affairs and maintain the national security, which is lodged in the executive.

The power and responsibility of Congress in its field is clear since it arises from the enumeration of legislative powers found in the Constitution. The trouble has arisen from three sources: First, the delegation of certain authority by the Congress to the President under the Trade Agreements Act; second, the enlargement of this authority in practice by the executive branch and particularly the State Department; and, third, the interrelation between tariff and trade regulation, that is, the congressional function, and the conduct of foreign affairs, which in turn, is clearly within the authority of the President under the Constitution.

In practice as it has developed under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and under the escape clause and similar statutory remedies against injury of domestic industries, the administration of the regulatory aspects of control over foreign commerce has gravitated to the executive branch of the Government, especially the State Department. There this legislative function has become mingled in unrecognizable form with the political aspects of our foreign relations, which unquestionably fall within the authority of the President and, in point of negotiation and execution, the Department of State.

To date several legislative efforts have been made to extricate the tangled functions of the Congress from those of the President, without much success. Since, however, the mingling of the functions has led to much bitterness expressed by domestic industries that have been severely injured and in some instances virtually destroyed by imports, it is desirable to inquire more closely into the source of the difficulty. Perhaps it will be possible to separate the executive from the legislative function and establish recognizable fields in which each branch has a distinct task to perform. If this separation is made in accordance with recognizable and agreed guidelines, much of the difficulty and controversy should henceforth disappear.

If we examine the origin, nature and purpose of the escape clause, some much-needed light may be thrown on the controversy. Much of the present confusion, arising from the intermingling of legislative and executive functions in the same field of action, may be dispelled.

Why was the concept of an escape clause in the trade agreements field born in the first place? Why was the clause in modified form given statutory dignity by Congress in 1951?

The need for an escape clause or an appeal is inherent in any operation in which precise measurements are not possible but where the consequences of faulty judgment or unforeseen developments may affect seriously the welfare of the interested parties. All who have had experience with the tariff will concede that it is not possible to foresee what will be the consequences of a given change in a rate of duty.

When in a program, such as the trade agreements approach to tariff leveling, many tariff changes are negotiated, it is obvious that unintended results might occur because of the uncertain effect of particular changes in rates.

Therefore, considering the probability of error in making tariff reductions on a broad scale it was clear that a remedy against serious effects of such mistakes or of unforeseen consequences should be provided.

This fact was recognized and in 1943 the first escape clause was inserted into a trade agreement, the one with Mexico. It was inserted into all subsequent agreements and in 1947 was written into the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Such a clause was in the nature of a reservation, revolving about a contingency such as an error in judgment or unforeseen developments, to be uncovered by events.

The Department of State itself has repeatedly pointed to the escape clause as the remedy against mistakes that might and no doubt would be made in negotiated tariff reductions. The Department laid no claim to infallibility in negotiations and admitted that mistakes might be made; but these, it said, could be corrected under subsequent reviews as the effects of the tariff reductions became apparent.

In the meantime the President also gave public assurances that no domestic industry was to be jeopardized by the trade agreements program.

Thus it was clear, at least on paper, that the house was in order. There was on the record no executive intention under the authority delegated to him by Congress under the Trade Agreements Act to harm American industry. Three successive Presidents have to date voiced such assurances. And there was the escape clause as evidence that a remedy could be had by any industry that was seriously injured.

As experience began to accumulate under the escape clause, however, it became apparent that there was a wide discrepancy between the official executive assurances and actual disposition of escape clause cases. The Tariff Commission itself at first—1947–51—dismissed most of the applications without a word of explanation.

Dissatisfaction among the industries that sought a remedy under the clause reached such proportions that legislation on the subject was sought. As a result Congress amended the Trade Agreements Act in 1951 by adoption of a statutory escape clause. It provided specific criteria for guidance of the Tariff Commission and required a report from that agency if it dismissed a case or failed to find serious injury or a threat thereof.

Subsequently the Tariff Commission found the degree of injury necessary to make a recommendation to the President in a much higher percentage of cases. To some extent this may have been a reflection of the increasing severity of import competition after 1951.

Yet after several years of experience with the statutory escape clause it became obvious that the President refused in most instances to accept the Commission's recommendations. Various pretexts were used by the President in rejecting its proposed remedies.

In some instances the President, after review by executive personnel, disagreed with the Commission's finding of fact. In other instances he attributed the distress of the particular industry to causes other than import competition. In yet other cases he evaluated the probable long-range effect of an increase in the duty and concluded on economic grounds that it would not be wise to follow the Commission's recommendation. In a number of cases he also cited the adverse effect that would be produced upon our friendly relations with other countries if imports from them should be restricted. Finally he invoked the general interest of the country, the protection of consumers, the need for export markets, and so forth, in explanation of his denial of a remedy. He refused in all cases involving purely industrial products to impose an import quota although this was authorized under the law and was recommended in several instances by the Commission.

These various reasons and pretexts reflect an almost hopeless mixture of elements of constitutional powers, both legislative and executive. The division of the powers between the Congress and the executive, as described above, and as set forth in the Constitution, was completely obliterated.

Little wonder that the applicants for a remedy felt numbed and perplexed. This reaction was not abated when it became known that the President engaged in the practice of launching supplemental inquiries into the facts of the case after its receipt from the Commission without in any instance exposing the newly gathered information to the public or to a hearing process. In effect he looked upon his action as a review of the Commission's recommendation without appeal and as not calling upon him to expose his hand to the applicants in the case. The process was in the nature of a unilateral rounding out of the case behind closed doors, with no public record of the conferences, inquiries, consultations, communications and other actions involved. The whole proceeding appeared to be nothing more than a search for uncontestable—because unexposed—data to substantiate his conclusion.

In nearly all cases in which the President did accept the Commission's finding on injury he modified the recommendations, in each instance diluting the suggested restrictions. In several cases the President exceeded the time limit prescribed in the statute for his consideration of a recommendation.

It must be obvious that the executive branch disposed of the delegation of authority from Congress under the Trade Agreements Act by mixing it with the President's own power to conduct foreign affairs and to look after the national security, swallowing the mixed potion and then coming up suddenly with a new and miraculous accession of power.

All such executive behavior was a far cry indeed from the assurances that were given to the public, and did not accord with the nature and origin of the escape clause. This was that if events showed that injury resulted from tariff reductions a correction would be made. Implicit in this view was the assumption that it was not the purpose of the trade agreements program to hurt our industries, our producers, our farmers, and workers and that if such injury did occur it was either the result of an error or of an unforeseen development.

Therefore the withdrawal of a concession was nothing more than invoking a reservation. The only question would therefore be the one of injury or threat of injury.

There was nothing in the actual invocation of these reservations that would give grounds for offense to any nation with which we had a trade agreement containing the escape clause, provided that we followed due process of law.

If one or more nations did complain they would be clearly out of order unless they could show that improper procedures were followed or errors committed in the process of factfinding by the Tariff Commission. This has not been alleged.

Now let us return once more to the attitude of the President in his official action as distinguished from his public assurances. It becomes obvious that a great gap opened between the one attitude and the other. It is a clear case of the political executive saying one thing for public consumption, guided by State Department declarations, and the official executive doing something quite different in fact. More than injury to a domestic industry was required to convince the President that a remedy was justified; yet that was all that Congress called for in the escape clause.

The President, for example, has asserted that he must go beyond the considerations that guide the Tariff Commission. We shall see how far his power of review has been stretched beyond the original concept, which is the one that has been carefully and tirelessly given to the public. In the Bicycle Escape Clause case decided August 18, 1955, the President wrote as follows:

> The President has the responsibility of considering, not only the question of injury to a domestic industry * * * but also the other fundamental questions bearing on the security and well-being of 165 million Americans. The President's final judgment in each case must represent the best composite evaluation he can make of these questions.

The President then listed five issues that must be decided in an escape clause case, and limited the Tariff Commission's function to the question of injury and relief to a domestic industry, while citing four additional ones that must be considered by the President. These four, he gave as follows: (a) Our national security interest in the economic strength of valued allies in the free world; (b) building export markets for the products of our farms, factories and mines; (c) compensation to other countries for withdrawal of concessions; and (d) protection of the American consumer against unnecessary and unjustified price increases.

From this recitation it is clear that the President has completely forsaken the position that the escape clause is a remedial step and looks upon his constitutional power as having been enlarged by that clause. He not only asserts his authority over foreign affairs and the national security but engulfs the other considerations that concern the Commission. As for the Commission itself, he virtually pushes it off the map.

Yet there is not one word in the statutory escape clause that confers any power upon the President to do more than accept or reject the recommendation of the Tariff Commission; nor should such power be extended to him as long as nothing more than the revocation or modification of a concession in a trade agreement is involved. A commission set up by the Congress would be incompetent indeed if it could not determine within the context of a detailed public hearing whether injury had been done by imports as a result, in part, of a tariff reduction; and that is the function of the Tariff Commission.

This is quite different from looking into the future and deciding whether a given reduction can be made without causing injury, as must be done before tariff reductions are negotiated. The Tariff Commission in an escape clause case has before it the consequences of the tariff reductions and therefore is not under the necessity of guessing, as was the State Department in negotiating the reductions in the first place.

Unquestionably at some point since the beginning a complete turnabout was executed by the State Department. In its propaganda, widely disseminated on the homefront, it made much of the remedy that was available to domestic industry if a mistake was made in an international tariff-cutting conference. Then when official action came out by way of the President's hand, we find the remedial aspect forgotten and a dozen pretexts herded together to explain why the President could not do what the Tariff Commission recommended to him.

No wonder that the escape clause administration became bogged down in a morass of unbelievable contradictions, inconsistencies, and confusions. It has been used as a vehicle to bypass the Tariff Commission and to bring the President's conduct of foreign affairs into precincts from which the Constitution excluded it.

In his various actions on the Commission's recommendations since 1951—date of the statutory escape clause—including the cases other than bicycles, the President has indeed all but superseded the Commission and freely substituted his judgment or that of his advisers for that of the congressional agency.

A review of the President's actions under the escape clause, be they acceptances in part of the Tariff Commission's recommendations or outright rejections or indeed postponements of decisions, uncovers no evidence that the constitutional limits to the President's power are looked upon as anything more substantial than ghostly filaments of gossamer; nor any that indicates the least regard for either the public assurances issued by him or the nature and professed purpose of the escape clause itself.

The President's authority over foreign affairs and his power as Commander in Chief in combination with delegation of administrative functions under the Trade Agreements Act have been treated as preempting the whole field of tariffs and trade to the exclusion of Congress and its agency.

How could this interpretation have been achieved?

It could come from two principal sources: First, as a conclusion from the notion that Congress may deliver constitutional power to the President bag and baggage by the mere process of delegation; or second, as a tour de force, reflecting nothing more than a grab for power that was seen to be weakly held. How otherwise, than by a constitutional amendment, dissolve the power of Congress over tariffs and trade, as has in fact occurred under the escape clause? No constitutional amendment has, however, been proposed. Yet Congress no longer regulates foreign commerce, nor does it make the tariff.

A law recently passed by Congress extends the power of the President to enter into trade agreements for a further period of 4 years. The purpose is to leapfrog over two Congresses and during that period leave the President to his devices under the escape clause. This means simply that the Congress in this field has become an adornment of the democratic process, as valuable as some relic suitably engraved for display in a museum.

If the President during this 4-year period continues to exercise his power of review over Tariff Commission recommendations as he has to date, and in the same sweeping fashion takes in the whole field of the domestic economy, as he has done, including the welfare of consumers, of exporters, and that of the applicant industry itself, in addition to the possible effects on foreign relations and the national security, the whole function of government in the sector of tariffs and trade will have been concentrated with unrelieved finality in the hands of the President. The power of the President will have been deployed over all the channels of foreign trade and his action will be the law. The citizens who are injured by import competition will have nowhere to turn and in point of practical effect will have been disfranchised.

Obviously what needs to be done involves a correction of this landslide of power under which much of our domestic industry, the workers employed by it, no less than domestic agriculture, will be smothered.

The corrective action, in turn, involves no more than the recognition of constitutional principles, the true nature of the escape clause, and a sense of simple equity. If, first, the character of the escape clause as a reserved remedy were recognized in practice; and, second, the President's bailiwick were defined so that his actions would not extend beyond his jurisdiction, the difficulty and confusion would be largely eliminated. The Tariff Commission would then speak for Congress in the part of the field that corresponds to the power of that body to regulate foreign commerce and lay and collect duties. It would also give practical effect to the escape clause and the assurances given in its behalf as a reservation against injury.

In all cases in which the Tariff Commission recommended rates no higher than the level from which they had been reduced in a concession, its findings should be binding upon the President. The proposed action of restoring or partially restoring the duty to its preconcession level would be no more than invoking the reservation implied in the escape clause. No country could properly complain against such action without alleging error by the Tariff Commission. Any such alleged errors could be brought before a court for proper adjudication.

However, in those cases in which more is involved than restoration of a duty in whole or in part, some other considerations do come into play. If, for example, an import quota is proposed where there was none in the first place, or where a rate higher than the 1934 duty is recommended, new ground is broken, and more than a reservation is invoked.

It would be necessary in such instances to recognize the President's authority in the field of foreign affairs. Modification of the tariff beyond restoration of a previous cut and the imposition of import quotas where none previously existed, do affect foreign relations. These are, of course, also of concern to Congress, but the Constitution vests the power to conduct foreign affairs in the presidency. The President also is directly concerned with the national security in his capacity as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces.

However, in recognizing the interest of the President in the tariff and foreign trade because of the scope of the general executive powers mentioned, it does not follow that these powers blank out those of Congress, which are specific and in fact are expressly cut out from the scope of the more general powers of the President, such as the conduct of foreign affairs, and vested in Congress. In other words, the Constitution-makers said in effect: "While we vest in the President the power to conduct foreign affairs, we now remove specific parts of this function and put them into the hands of Congress; namely, the tariff and the regulation of foreign commerce"; and the same with respect to any other general authority of the executive that might overlap with these specific functions of the Congress.

Also the President's constitutional power to conduct foreign affairs does not change the rights reserved under the escape clause to withdraw concessions when serious injury has been established by the Tariff Commission. Section 6 of the Trade Agreement Extension Act of 1951 which adopted the statutory escape clause says:

> No reduction in any rate of duty, * * * or other concession hereafter proclaimed under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, shall be permitted to continue in effect when the product on which the concession has been granted is, as a result, in whole or in part, of the duty or other * * * such concession, being imported into the United States in such quantities * * * as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry.

A proper division of powers under the escape clause between the President and the Congress would require rendering unto Caesar what is Caesar's and no more.

From the foregoing exposition it follows that—

First. The Tariff Commission findings should be final and binding upon the President if the recommendation of the Commission did not call for more than restoration in whole or in part of a tariff rate previously reduced or did not otherwise propose any restriction greater than had been effective before the concession.

This would recognize the original reservational character of the escape clause, that is, action under the clause could only be construed as a remedial step to correct an error or some unforeseen development.

If other countries should protest our withdrawal of a concession, compensatory concessions might be negotiated with them; provided (a) that reciprocal concessions were in fact obtained in return for our concession when the trade agreement was negotiated; (b) that any such concessions have not been nullified by the other countries through imposition of other restrictions, such as import licenses, quotas, and so forth; and (c) that other products suitable for compensatory concessions can be found without subjecting them in turn to injury.

Second. If the Tariff Commission's recommendation should call for a duty higher than the rate of 1934 or its ad valorem equivalent today, or an import quota or other customs treatment more restrictive than was in effect before a trade agreement concession was granted on the product, the President's right to reject such a recommendation if he found it objectionable in the field of his jurisdiction, should be recognized.

If under these circumstances the President undertook to reject a recommendation on the grounds that it would interfere with his power to conduct foreign affairs he must find as a fact and certify that promulgation of the recommendation would disrupt friendly relations with specified countries because of specified results of a duty increase or the imposition of an import quota. No mere assertions that such results would follow would be sufficient. Convincing evidence must be cited, showing the adverse effects that would befall the economy of the principal supplying countries if our imports of the product in question were limited as proposed by the Tariff Commission.

For example, the President might be called upon to show (a) that the product in question represents an appreciable segment of the economy of one or more of the countries shipping it to us; (b) that exports of the product represent an important part of the output of the product in one or more of the producing countries; and (c) that exports to the United States account for a large part of total exports of the product.

With respect to the domain of the national security as it might be affected by escape clause restrictions, the President, under the circumstances set forth under paragraph second, immediately above, might reject a recommendation of the Tariff Commission if he found that its promulgation would prevent the United States from obtaining a quantity of the product in question sufficient for the maintenance of the proper military defense of the country. Again, within the limits of national security regulations, the President must do more than merely assert a conclusion. He must cite substantiating evidence to sustain such conclusion.

Should the President not find the Commission's recommendation objectionable on one or both of these two counts—under the conditions set forth under paragraph second above—he would proclaim the Tariff Commission's recommendation unmodified and within the time limit set by Congress.

If these guidelines were followed most, if not all, the objections that have been lodged against the escape clause administration during the past 10 years would be overcome. The President would refrain from entering the domains of Congress as represented by the Tariff Commission in rejecting the Commission's recommendations and would not cite considerations of the domestic economy, consumer interest, export promotion, and similar elements, including economic speculations, that do not, in the field of tariffs and trade, pertain to his office, but are strictly in the jurisdiction of Congress and in fact have not been delegated, if indeed they could be.

The escape clause would be restored to its original and logical concept and the province or jurisdiction of both the Congress and the President would be recognized and respected, and that is as it should be.

PART II: ESCAPE CLAUSE ASSURANCES AND INTERPRETATIONS BY THREE PRESIDENTS, THREE SECRETARIES OF STATE, AND OTHER OFFICIALS OF THE GOVERNMENT FROM 1934 TO 1958—A PARTIAL REVIEW OF HEARINGS BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE AND THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE ON TRADE AGREEMENTS LEGISLATION

PRESIDENTIAL ASSURANCES SINCE 1934 ON INJURY AND ON THE ESCAPE CLAUSE

The Trade Agreements Act was first passed in 1934. Franklin D. Roosevelt was then President. In his message to Congress recommending the trade agreements legislation, he said:

"The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed. The adjustment of our foreign-trade relations must rest on the premise of undertaking to benefit and not to injure such interests."

On June 15, 1934, in a letter to Representative Buck, of California, President Roosevelt again expressed himself in a manner reassuring to domestic industry:

"I am somewhat surprised and a little amused at the fears you say have been aroused in California because of the enactment and possible administration of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Certainly it is not the purpose of the administration to sacrifice the farmers and fruitgrowers of California in the pursuit of the will-o'-the-wisp of foreign markets, as published reports would make believe. I trust that no Californian will have any concern or fear that anything damaging to the fruitgrowers of that State or of any other State will result from this legislation."

These quotations show the early concern over import injury. The statements were clear and without evasion. Let us see what subsequent expressions reflect.

President Harry S. Truman wrote as follows in a letter to Speaker of the House SAM RAYBURN, May 25, 1945. This was on the occasion of a proposed renewal of the Trade Agreements Act with authority for further 50-percent tariff reductions:

"I have had drawn to my attention statements to the effect that this increased authority might be used in such a way as to endanger or 'trade out' segments of American industry, American agriculture, or American labor. No such action was taken under President Roosevelt and Cordell Hull, and no such action will take place under my Presidency."

This shows conscious continuity from one administration to the next, i.e., from the Roosevelt administration to that of Mr. Truman.

Again, President Truman, on March 1, 1948, addressed a letter to the Congress calling for another 3-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act. In this letter he said:

"Furthermore, we need have no fear of serious harm to any domestic producer. * * *

"I assured the Congress, when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was extended in 1945, that domestic producers would be safeguarded in the process of expanding trade. That commitment has been kept. It will continue to be kept. * * * Finally, each agreement will continue to include a clause which will permit withdrawal or modification of concessions if, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the concessions, imports increase to such an extent as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers." (Testimony before Subcommittee on Tariffs and Foreign Trade of the Committee on Ways and Means on the trade agreements program, May 1948, p. 5.)

The third President since 1934, Mr. Dwight D. Eisenhower, expressed himself as follows in a letter to Speaker JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., on the occasion of House action on H.R. 1, February 18, 1955:

"No American industry will be placed in jeopardy by the administration of this measure. Were we to do so, we would undermine the ideal for which we have made so many sacrifices and are doing so much throughout the world to preserve."

In an address before the Associated Press at the Waldorf Astoria on April 25 of the same year Mr. Eisenhower spoke as follows:

"Reductions in tariffs and other trade barriers both here and abroad must be gradual, selective, reciprocal. Changes which would result in the threat of serious injury to industry or general reduction in employment would not strengthen the economy of this country or the free world. The trade measures that I have recommended to the Congress were prepared in recognition of these important facts."

President Eisenhower in a speech on the "Trade Agreements Program," printed by the Department of State as Commercial Policy Series 168 and also in the Department of State Bulletin (April 4, 1958), said:

"So in order to dispel honest doubts about the reciprocal trade legislation's great value to the entire Nation, we should first hammer home the fact that safeguards in the law are being strengthened to cope with uneven impact of import competition."

These expressions from President Eisenhower reaffirm the principle, enunciated by his two predecessors, of safeguarding domestic industries, domestic agriculture and labor against serious injury from imports. In other words, there has been no change in enunciated policy in this respect.

That this policy was profoundly sincere from the outset was made all the more evident when certain procedures were established to make sure, both beforehand, i.e., previous to entry into any trade agreement, and afterward, i.e., after entering into any such agreement, that no serious injury would be inflicted on domestic industry.

By Executive Order 6750 dated June 27, 1934, it was provided that before a trade agreement was entered into public hearings must be held by a committee representing the various Government departments having competence in the field. This was to afford all interested parties an opportunity to appear, to give evidence and to be heard. The evidence so gathered was to serve as a guide to the official negotiating teams representing the United States in tariff-cutting conferences with other countries. Presumably, acting by such guidance, our negotiators would be able to avoid infliction of future injury on the industries that would be affected by contemplated tariff reductions. The committee became known as the Committee for Reciprocity Information or CRI.

The avowed purpose was to avoid costly mistakes by taking a look before leaping.

At the same time the early bilateral agreements had built-in escape hatches of their own. This practice was formalized in the standard escape clause introduced initially in the trade agreement with Mexico, January 1943, and subsequently placed in all others. This device was adopted for the purpose of providing a remedy against injury from imports after the fact, so to speak, i.e., after a trade agreement had been made. Later the escape clause was also placed in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade signed in Geneva October 30, 1947.

In other words, procedurally elaborate trappings were provided for the assurance of freedom from serious injury.

HEARINGS IN 1934 BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS MARKING THE INITIAL STEP IN TRADE AGREEMENTS LEGISLATION

The policy against causing injury to domestic industries through the trade agreements program was given expression in the first Presidential message to Congress recommending adoption of the program.

President Roosevelt in a message to Congress, recommending enactment of trade legislation, said in part:

"The exercise of the authority I propose must be carefully weighed in the light of the latest information there is to give assurance that no sound and important American industry will be injuriously disturbed. The adjustment of foreign trade relations must rest on the premise of undertaking to benefit and not to injure such interests." (Quoted p. 458, hearings on reciprocal trade agreements before House Committee on Ways and Means, March 8–14, 1934.)

Secretary of State Cordell Hull, the first witness in the hearings just cited, i.e., the first one held by Congress on the subject, said:

"But in any event, whatever our Government may do in negotiating reciprocal trade arrangements, it will first see to it that they are mutually profitable and that they are not negotiated in a way that would result in injury or hurt to our own country." (Hearings, Ways and Means Committee, March 1934, on reciprocal trade agreements, p. 23.)

Again, on page 24 of the same hearings he repeated the same assurance, several times. At one place he said:

"But our purpose is to make a beginning by picking out one item very carefully here, another commodity over there very carefully, which, as is said, can be made the basis of an interchange in a mutually profitable way, so that instead of anybody being injured, the American people would be helped."

Assistant Secretary of State Francis B. Sayre in the same hearings (p. 342) gave the same assurance:

"We are proposing something that * * * while enhancing general prosperity is not going to be unduly injurious to any individual industry."

On page 344, he continued:

"I want the American people and the American public cared for * * * the State Department has that matter in very careful consideration and is trying to see whether it is possible to work out some kind of an arrangement which will not prove injurious to American producers, through seasonal or other kinds of arrangements."

On page 345, in answer to a question from a member of the committee, he repeated his assurance:

"The State Department exists, in my conception, to promote American interests, not to injure them."

Chairman Doughton of the Ways and Means Committee spoke as follows (hearings, p. 469):

"The impression seems to be that the President of the United States with the various agencies he can call to his assistance, would just go in and barter away, some say, or as some others say, obliterate American industry.

"Now, do you not have confidence enough, and are we not all justified in having confidence enough in the President of the United States with the agencies at his command, to work out this legislation, if this legislation (trade agreements bill) is passed, without injury to the welfare of the American people and American industry?"

HEARINGS IN 1934 BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ON THE TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

Secretary Hull repeated his assurances about care against injury to American industry:

"That is the point I make about it, and the last thing that the President would want to do would be to injure business" (p. 16, hearings, Senate Finance Committee on Reciprocal Trade Agreements, April, May 1934).

In the same hearings Secretary Hull said (p. 23):

"If you want to reject this proposal, on the speculative possibility that somebody will purposely injure another, why, of course, that is not for me to comment on."

Mr. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State, had this to say in an exchange with a member of the Finance Committee (p. 72):

"I am not for eliminating tariffs, as I said at the very outset. We have got to stand on our feet here as reasonable men. I know it is not in the contemplation of the present President, nor of any member of the administration, to go out and wreck industries. I think it is perfectly chimerical to suppose that the President, or anyone with the responsibility of acting under the authority which we hope you gentlemen will give us under this bill, is going to set out to wreck industries. Not for a moment."

On page 78, same hearings Mr. Sayre was explicit. He said:

"It is a proceeding which will mean finding bargains which will prove to advantage to foreign trade, without undue injury to American producers. Now, those responsible for this program will have * * * a real problem of finding just how trade can be increased, without undue injury to American producers.

"I have studied the problem enough myself to be convinced that we can secure a substantial increase of foreign trade without injury.

* * * * *

"The object is to increase our exports without increasing those kinds of imports which will work undue injury to American domestic producers."

HEARINGS IN 1943 BEFORE THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Secretary of State Cordell Hull, in testifying on April 12, 1943, on the Extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act before the House Committee on Ways and Means, referred to the precautions taken to avoid injury (p. 17, hearings):

"Up to this time, nobody has been seriously hurt in this country by these readjustments (tariff reductions). Every precaution is provided in advance to take care of any unexpected development that might be injurious or materially hurtful to any of our industries."

The Honorable Francis B. Sayre, special assistant to the Secretary of State, appearing before the Ways and Means Committee, April 15, 1943, spoke as follows (p. 216, Hearings on Extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program):

"Now, our object in adjusting tariffs is to find ways and means for securing concessions, and trading off for them reductions in our own tariffs in such a way that we do not injure our domestic producers."

On page 229 of the same hearings, Mr. Sayre said:

"We consider that our mandate is only the granting of such concessions as can be done without injuring domestic producers."

On page 230 he adds:

"May I say * * * that the Tariff Commission does, in fact, gather the facts and make recommendations (i.e., preceding a trade agreement) as to such concessions on imports into the United States as it thinks could safely be made without injuring American domestic producers. * * *

* * * * *

"It isn't a matter of theory. It is a matter of practical, hardheaded, brass-tack determination of, 'Can we increase American exports without unduly injuring American producers.' "

On page 245 Mr. Sayre said:

"The difficulty has been (in dealing with Australia, New Zealand and South Africa), and will be, our careful concern of American producers. We run there into various competitive goods. It is a difficult problem. We are not going to go ahead unless we find a way of doing so without injuring American producers."

Mr. Lynn Edminster, Vice Chairman, the U.S. Tariff Commission, in his testimony before the same committee on April 16, 1943, said (p. 307):

"This is indispensable [thorough assembly and analysis of facts] * * * from the standpoint of making certain that the concessions granted to other countries will not result in serious injury to the domestic producers immediately concerned."

On page 312, Mr. Edminster, continuing on the same subject, said:

"And while they [the men who work on the trade agreements program] are not infallible, there ought to be a strong presumption that the decisions arrived at under the process * * * described are responsible and wise decisions in all of the circumstances.

"Nevertheless, there is ample opportunity, under the program, to deal with situations not foreseen at the time of the negotiations and to remedy any mistakes that may be made."

HEARINGS IN 1945 BEFORE THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE, APRIL AND MAY 1945

Mr. William L. Clayton, newly appointed Assistant Secretary of State, testified in place of Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Secretary of State. The latter said of Mr. Clayton (p. 11 of the hearings) that the primary responsibility for trade agreements rested with Mr. Clayton, who was in charge of the economic division of the Department. Said Mr. Clayton (hearings, p. 19):

"It is important that the Congress be satisfied that the machinery for the construction of these trade agreements is designed to eliminate every foreseeable source of error and to reduce to the absolute minimum the chance that an agreement may work an injustice on some American producing or consuming group."

HEARINGS IN 1948 BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION BILL

Mr. William L. Clayton, former Under Secretary of State, but in 1948 adviser to the Secretary of State, under whom the trade agreements program was administered for several years, spoke as follows about the Executive order that contained the escape clause (hearings, pp. 416–417):

"That Executive order was issued as a result of and following several conferences which I had with Senators Vandenberg and Millikin in January and February 1947, just prior to the departure of the United States delegation to the conference at Geneva [the conference that resulted in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] * * *.

* * * * *

"Part I of the Executive order provides for the so-called escape clause. That is very simple, Mr. Chairman, and I think one that is very workable and very effective for the purpose for which it was adopted.

* * * * *

"I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion that is a very effective means of giving relief to producers who have been injured or who are able to show that they are seriously threatened with injury."

With respect to diplomatic considerations that might enter into trade agreement concessions, Mr. Clayton had a very definite opinion (same hearings, p. 437):

"There is just one final point that I would like to make with reference to the administration of the act, and that is that the charge has been made that these agreements are often made, and concessions are often granted, as to our import duties, for political or diplomatic reasons. I can assure you gentlemen that during my stay in the State Department I have known of no single case in which that has been done.

"We make these agreements purely on economic grounds in order to try to increase the international trade of the United States."

Mr. Charles F. Brannan, then Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, also testifying before the House Ways and Means Subcommittee on the trade agreements program, May 6, 1948, page 285 of the hearings, said:

"It has been a basic policy to avoid injury to established domestic producers, whether industrial or agricultural. Moreover, on the basis of experience under the program * * * there has been worked out a method for dealing with cases of unforeseen threat of injury to a domestic industry. This now insures completely against the possibility, even after making duty reductions only with great caution, of a disruption of American farm markets by excessive imports of agricultural products. The protection now takes the form of the so-called escape clause."

HEARING IN 1948 BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE, SAME SUBJECT, JUNE 1958

Mr. William L. Clayton was also the leading Government witness before the Senate Finance Committee in 1948. His testimony was given after the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) had gone into effect, i.e., January 1948. In a formal statement discussing the precaution with which trade agreements were negotiated, Mr. Clayton (p. 17, hearings, June 1, 1948) said:

"However, safeguarding procedure does not end there; we also have the escape clause which permits withdrawal of any concession which endangers a domestic industry. Such withdrawal can be unilateral, if necessary, and may occur in case of threatened as well as actual injury if imports under a concession increase as a result of unforeseen circumstances. Designed to be operated by the Tariff Commission reporting directly to the President, it offers a prompt and sure remedy always available when needed."

On pages 23–24 of the same hearings appears the following interchange between the chairman and Mr. Clayton:

"The CHAIRMAN. Has not the President said that there would be no injury to American industry?

"Mr. CLAYTON. He has said that if it is shown that any concession does injury to any American producer or threatens injury, there is a way by which that producer can get redress.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did he not give affirmative assurance and did not the State Department give affirmative assurance in hearings which have been held on this subject that no American industry would be injured?

"Mr. CLAYTON. That is right, and we put in the escape clause to make sure that was carried out.

* * * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. If you cannot determine that (i.e., injury, prior to a trade agreement), Mr. Clayton, why make an agreement? Why, after promising that no industry will be injured, do you speculate with your promise?

"Mr. CLAYTON. We don't speculate, Mr. Chairman. We put in an absolute condition which will guarantee the performance of that promise, which is the escape clause."

Another interchange on the same subject may be found on page 31 of the hearings:

"The CHAIRMAN. The State Department and the President have assured domestic industry against injury as a result of these agreements. You are changing that under your latest statements here, that we shall assure American industry against injury except as to certain calculated risks.

"Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir. The only possible way that we can insure, that the Government can insure, that the administration can insure domestic producers they would not be injured by action taken under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is through the operation of the escape clause, unless you want to say we are going to make tariffs 200 or 300 percent of the value of the commodity."

On page 32 of the same hearings Mr. Clayton said:

"If under the Executive order of February 25, 1947 (establishing the escape clause), an American producer makes out a good case for his complaint that he is being injured or threatened with serious injury and the Tariff Commission could so find. I think the President must give relief, regardless of what may happen in the agreement."

Then again on page 33, the interchange is as follows:

"Mr. CLAYTON. The point is, Senator, and I go back to it and I contend that I am right, that under this Executive order of February 25, 1947, relief has to be given and will be given to an American producer who makes out a good case.

"The CHAIRMAN. Regardless of what the repercussion might be?

"Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir. I think it will."

On page 40 Mr. Clayton, in answer to the chairman's comment on the consequences of failure to safeguard domestic industry, says:

"I think that movement into action promptly under the escape clause to correct any bad judgment that has been made and prompt action will be taken."

On page 52, remarking upon the difficulty of finding the peril point Mr. Clayton replied to the chairman:

"We don't profess to have any sure way of finding it (i.e., the point below which a duty could not be cut without causing injury), Mr. Chairman. We don't attempt to find it with absolute certainty, because we know we can't. But what we do say is that if these are those cases where we take some calculated risks in order to achieve an overall desideratum, and we find we are wrong, we have a protection here in the escape clause, so the mistake, if it occurs, can be corrected."

On page 477, in response to apprehension expressed by a committee member, Mr. Clayton replied:

"Of course, we always have the escape clause if it should develop that these companies are being seriously endangered by falling demand, coincidental with big imports from abroad. The escape clause is always a means of taking care of that."

The Chairman of the U.S. Tariff Commission, Mr. Oscar B. Ryder, also testified before the Senate Finance Committee in 1948. He testified on June 2 and his testimony begins on page 107 of the hearings on "Extending Authority to Negotiate Trade Agreements." On page 122 these questions and answers were exchanged:

"Mr. RYDER. If in my judgment the probability were strong that a reduction of 30 percent would result in serious injury to an important domestic industry, I would be inclined to vote against going that far.

"The CHAIRMAN (Senator Millikin). You would not trade that against an export advantage?

"Mr. RYDER. No; I would not be inclined to do so."

On page 133 Mr. Ryder spoke of the escape clause as follows:

"Mr. RYDER. I had something to do with the drafting of the escape clause as it was originally drafted, and put in the Mexican agreement. It was drafted because of the very obvious difficulty of foreseeing what would be the situation at the end of the war. * * *

"Manifestly, what looked safe then now might in conditions after the war be entirely unsafe. So in solving that problem, we hit upon, at my suggestion, the present escape clause which is written into the Mexican agreement."

HEARINGS IN 1955 BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ON TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION, MARCH 1955

Secretary of State Dulles testified before the Finance Committee and the question of the escape clause arose. Questions and answers were as follows (hearings, pp. 1256–60):

"Senator MILLIKIN. I would like to ask the Secretary: Does he believe in the provisions of the Trade Agreements Act which state that there should be no serious injury to domestic industry?

"Secretary DULLES. I don't know that one could take that as an absolute criterion. Certainly it is a very important one.

"Senator MILLIKIN. The law says that. That is what the law says.

"Secretary DULLES. You asked, I thought, my opinion as to whether you could take as an absolute criterion the rule that there should be no imports if they involve injury to American industry. I wouldn't be able to agree with that.

* * * * *

"Senator MILLIKIN. May I read the provision from the law. I am reading from section 6(a) of the existing law:

" 'No reduction in any rate of duty * * * or other concessions * * * shall be permitted to continue in effect when the product on which the concession has been granted is, as a result * * * of the duty or other customs treatment reflecting such concession being imported into the United States in such increased quantities * * * as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products.'

"I don't know of any exception to that provision. The provision itself seems very clear to me.

"Secretary DULLES. That is the so-called escape clause you are reading there.

"Senator MILLIKIN. Yes. * * *

"Secretary DULLES. I would agree with that. Perhaps I misunderstood your earlier question. Could we operate this law without injury to American industry? I don't believe we can operate this law without some injury to some American industries.

* * * * *

"Senator MILLIKIN. I think that is the heart of the criticism of this law, that it is believed that we can injure American producers if, for some international purposes, it will better our foreign relations, or we think it will better our foreign relations, and I wonder what the authority for that attitude is.

"Secretary DULLES. It is my understanding that the so-called escape clause is not designed to protect from injury every particular element in American industry. I believe that there has been some question about amending it so as to make it read that way.

* * * * *

"Senator MILLIKIN. The law says—it refers to goods being imported into the United States in such increased quantities * * * as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products.

"Secretary DULLES. I think that is interpreted, sir—I am not a great expert on these matters—to mean injury to an industry as a whole and not necessarily injury to every particular concern in that business.

"Senator MILLIKIN. I think the result of that, Mr. Secretary, is that if you are a small fellow making one product and are injured, it might apply to him, but if you are a large fellow making several products, making money on the whole, it might not apply to that part of his business because he is making money on the whole business. * * *

"Secretary DULLES. I do recognize that the competition, whether it is domestic or foreign, does injury, and it injures, first, the weaker and less economical units in an industry.

"Senator MILLIKIN. Yes.

"Secretary DULLES. That is just a law of economic life. I don't believe we can get away from it.

* * * * *

"Secretary DULLES. * * * I do not think you can have imports without some damage, and if your rule is that you will not have imports or tariff reductions or sustain them if there is damage to anybody, then I think it becomes automatically unworkable.

"Senator MILLIKIN. I invite the Secretary's attention to the fact that the law doesn't say that.

"Secretary DULLES. I may be wrong in my interpretation of the law. All I can say is if the law means what the Senator suggests that it means, then I am quite sure that the President will carry it out, because the President is the most law-abiding person I know of.

"Senator MILLIKIN. That raises a question: What does the law say? The law says that no business shall be injured, and I assume the President will carry out the provisions of the law.

* * * * *

"Senator MILLIKIN. Let's assume a case. Let's assume that an industry, generally speaking, is seriously injured.

"Do you believe that under some international circumstances the injury shall be allowed to take place?

"Secretary DULLES. I do not believe that under those circumstances, that under the law, the President would have discretion to commit the serious injury to an industry, as a whole.

"Senator MILLIKIN. I mean a particular industry in a particular line of business.

"Secretary DULLES. Yes.

"If there was an industry as a whole * * * I think it would be very difficult for the President not to take action. * * *

"If there was a minor injury, or if it only related to small segments of the industry, then I think the law does not prohibit the action.

* * * * *

"Senator MILLIKIN. What I am driving at: Let's assume serious injury——

* * * * *

"Secretary DULLES. All right.

"Senator MILLIKIN. Under that kind of a case, would the President have the power, or anybody have the power, to disregard the injury if continuing that injury will serve our international purposes?

"Secretary DULLES. I think that under the circumstances the President would take action of some kind to remedy the injury, if in his judgment serious injury existed."

With respect to the importance attached by Secretary Dulles to an "industry as a whole" being injured before the escape clause could be invoked, it may be recalled that he said there was "some question about amending it (the law) so as to make it read that way" (i.e., segments or elements of an industry rather than an industry as a whole).

This was done with the very bill about which the Secretary was then testifying. In other words, the law was amended to make it clear that injury need not extend to a whole industry in order that relief might be had under the escape clause (sec. 6(b), Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955).

On page 2062 of the 1955 hearings, extensively quoted from hereinabove, Secretary Dulles responded to the chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator BYRD, saying:

"Secretary DULLES. In other words, we have gotten the agreement of all the countries to the effect that when we give them a tariff concession we can always get out of it through the operation of the escape clause; we have made the escape clause a multilateral undertaking instead of just a unilateral undertaking."

On page 2079 Mr. Dulles expressed himself on the position of the President with respect to the escape clause:

"Senator MALONE. The President * * * has the full authority as far as the escape clause is concerned, regardless of what the Tariff Commission or any other agency that you might consult might say. He is the sole judge as to whether the escape clause is to be invoked or not; is he not?

"Secretary DULLES. Yes, sir.

"Senator MALONE. These are important points because we have been led to believe through various comments and statements made by witnesses and others, over a period of years, that there is always a sure way out, that nobody would be injured.

"But the President is the judge of whether or not the good done the entire country for the improvement of foreign relations, or for the improvement of relations between industries in this country, justifies invoking the escape clause or the peril point, regardless of what the Tariff Commission says.

"Secretary DULLES. Yes."

HEARINGS IN 1958 BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ON TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT EXTENSION, JUNE 1958

Secretary of Commerce Sinclair Weeks was the principal spokesman for the executive branch before the congressional committee in 1958 when the trade agreements program was once more considered for extension. The policy of no serious injury to domestic industry was continued, as a few quotations from the testimony before the Finance Committee will demonstrate.

On page 81 of the 1958 hearings Mr. Weeks in his written statement said:

"It is proposed not only that the peril point and escape clause procedures and safeguards for American industry and labor in the present law be continued, but also that the safeguards be strengthened.

On page 82 the Secretary of Commerce elaborated as follows:

"There are two broad types of problems against which we all agree safeguards are needed. The first is the possibility of serious injury to individuals or segments of industries. This is the problem of commercial injury.

* * * * *

"Our safeguards against commercial injury are of two kinds. One, the peril point procedure is designed to * * * avoid making tariff concessions which will threaten commercial injury. The other is a remedial provision—the escape clause—designed to give individual firms and industries a procedure for seeking a remedy where concessions do, as a result of unforeseen circumstances, create such injury."

In a reference to the European Economic Community (Common Market) the Secretary of Commerce spoke of negotiating tariff reductions with it. On page 86 of the hearings he observed:

"When these rates (Common Market tariffs) are known, we in this country will have to work out our list of possible United States concessions painstakingly and carefully, to insure that we screen out any which might threaten serious injury to any United States industry."

On page 88, he added:

"A Secretary of Commerce, if he is to do an honest job, must do what he can to provide protection both for the company and the worker who make products for export and the company and the worker who compete with the foreign producer."

On page 131 an exchange took place between Senator LONG, of Louisiana, and the Secretary of Commerce:

"Senator LONG. But on the other hand, where you have got a domestic industry that is having a very hard time of it, and it is getting the worst of it, * * * perhaps we should give more protection than we are giving.

* * * * *

"Secretary WEEKS. I think that industry should be protected against severe injury, and the President has so stated in the last 4 or 5 years, several times to the Congress, in letters to individuals, that he does not intend to see any industry in jeopardy or severely injured."

On page 134 the Secretary of Commerce reiterated the view so many times expressed by other officials:

"I think that if a given industry is faced with disastrous competition, the administration's program is to see that it is not placed in jeopardy."

OPINIONS OF SUPPORTERS OF THE TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM ON ESCAPE CLAUSE REMEDY

The notion that the escape clause offers a true remedy to domestic industry that is seriously injured or threatened by imports has persisted among those who have no doubt been impressed by the Presidential and other official assurances of the availability of a remedy.

Testimony given in various public hearings by a variety of nongovernmental witnesses who support the trade agreements program indicates how widespread the notion has become.

The hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee, May 3–8, 1948, on the trade agreements program produced the following statements, excerpted from oral or written testimony:

W. R. Ogg, the American Farm Bureau Federation (also a supporter of the program) in his statement said (p. 252 ff.):

"The reciprocal trade program is one of the practical tools that can be used to promote trade without unduly disrupting our domestic industries.

* * * * *

"One of the safeguards is the so-called escape clause, which should be included in all trade agreements.

* * * * *

"We favor a gradual reduction (of tariffs) * * * where it can be done without injury to our interests. Certainly we would not favor reducing a tariff that would put us out of business or seriously injure domestic industry."

Charles P. Taft, testifying in support of the trade program, said the following (pp. 295 ff.):

"The statement made by Mr. W. L. Clayton on many occasions 3 years ago was that this program had been and would be so administered as to cause no substantial injury to any American industry of any importance."

Mr. Russell Smith, legislative secretary, National Farmers Union, testified as follows (p. 308):

"It should be mentioned that the so-called escape clause does not appear in trade agreement legislation. (This testimony was in 1948. Escape clause legislation was enacted by Congress in 1951.) From the first, however, the trade agreements program has been conducted with appreciation of the need, not only for preventing injury to any industry in the granting of reduction of duties, but also for having an escape of some sort in case unforeseen developments might cause injury to an industry affected by a concession granted.

"Reliance was placed not only on general annulment provisions but also on specific safeguards. * * *

* * * * *

"Experience with these safeguards indicated the need for a more specific escape of the type now generally employed. The language of the present escape clause was first employed in the agreement concluded with Mexico in 1943. * * * Executive Order 9832 of February 25, 1947, made it mandatory that the clause be included in all future agreements."

Morris S. Rosenthal, president, National Council of American Importers, spoke in a similar vein (p. 325):

"Executive Order No. 9832 was issued * * * Senators Vandenberg and Millikin * * * participated in the meeting with the President, as did Under Secretaries of State Acheson and Clayton, thereby assuring the bipartisan nature of the order. The Executive order was important in that it provided for an escape clause."

Mr. Earl O. Shreve, president, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, also testified. His testimony begins on page 215 of the 1948 hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means. He stated that the chamber's policy was adopted in 1946 on the subject of Trade Agreements. Among other things it said (p. 217):

"There should be appropriate safeguards * * * and clauses in the agreements providing, in case of unforeseen developments, for the modification or withdrawal of concessions, in order to prevent serious injury to domestic producers. Neither in the original form nor in practical application by reason of events that were not contemplated should agreements be permitted to cause destructive competition in American agriculture or industry."

The National Foreign Trade Council was represented at the hearings by Mr. William S. Swingle, executive vice president. On page 169 of the hearings he said:

"Such an escape clause (referring to the escape clause contained in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) provides a much more realistic device for protecting American industries from harmful competition from foreign concerns in the American market than would be afforded by * * * (the peril point then proposed by legislation). All such investigations (under the peril point procedure) and recommendations by the Tariff Commission prior to negotiation of a trade agreement must of necessity be rather speculative in character, since so many variable and unknown factors would be involved in such investigations."

R. M. Hollingshead Corp. (pp. 519–520 of the hearings):

"Adequate safeguards, against misuse of the tariff authority are contained in the act and satisfactory provisions are carried out in administration of the program to redress any injury that changing conditions might inflict on domestic industry.

* * * * *

"Escape clause in all agreements gives adequate protection to any American industry fearful of being harmed: All American industries are assured that the administration of the act will not harm them. They are given the opportunity, upon being harmed, to request immediate relief."

Spokesmen for the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce informed the committee as follows (p. 522 of the hearings):

"The inclusion of so-called escape clause provided for in the Executive order issued February 25, 1947, by the President guarantees adequate protection to domestic industry against destructive competition from foreign goods, with the Tariff Commission given authority to administer this provision."

W. L. Batt, former president of SKF Industries, said (p. 524):

"We think the safety measures provided will insure against material damage to American industry."

The vice president of Grace Lines, Inc., said (p. 528):

"Escape clauses and negotiation machinery give ample outlet for special cases."

Wilbur-Ellis Co., large San Francisco importers, said much the same (p. 529):

"Individually negotiated reciprocal trade agreements give much-needed impetus to our own import trade and at the same time, by the provision of escape clauses, protect our domestic economy and domestic producers."

Mr. Alger Hiss, former president, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, testified before the Senate Finance Committee, June 2, 1948, on H.R. 6566 (trade agreements extension bill) making a statement in behalf of the Citizens' Committee for Reciprocal World Trade. First he inserted a statement of Mr. Gerard Swope, former president, General Electric Co., into the record.

In Mr. Swope's statement reference is made to the procedures followed under the trade agreements program. He said (p. 177):

"These procedures are thoroughly democratic in providing public hearings at which interested parties can present not only their facts but even their fears; * * * and in making assurance doubly sure by providing an 'escape clause' under which relief is mandatory, after Tariff Commission study and recommendations, for even the threat of injury to a bona fide domestic interest."

Here is evidence that someone was sufficiently misinformed to believe that the remedy provided by the escape clause was mandatory. That notion could only have come from State Department publicity, Presidential statements and the like.

Mr. Hiss, in his own testimony, differed from nearly all the other official witnesses. On page 190 of the 1948 hearings is found the following interchange between Mr. Hiss and Chairman Millikin of the Finance Committee:

"Mr. HISS. Senator, the Presidential order to which you refer I think relates to the escape clause solely, does it not?

"The CHAIRMAN. I am not speaking of that. I am speaking of the President's assurance in public speeches and otherwise that the operation of this act would not be permitted to injure any domestic industry.

"Mr. HISS. It seems to me the record has demonstrated that that is the result.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you accept that as the standard?

"Mr. HISS. Senator, if you mean that in no case would any single American industry be in any way injured by imports permitted through a concession, I would not agree.

"The CHAIRMAN. Serious injury.

"Mr. HISS. I would say any——

"The CHAIRMAN. You still would not agree?

"Mr. HISS. I still would not agree."

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAY. I take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman from West Virginia on his forthright statement. He has always been a champion of American industry.

I represent a district in southern Illinois where foreign imports have displaced hundreds of American workers. I know what it means when you open up the trade barriers and allow these foreign imports produced with cheap labor to come in and take the place of products produced by American workmen.

I again want to compliment the gentleman from West Virginia on his diligent effort to try to protect the American worker, and I associate myself with the remarks he has made here.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman.

In conclusion, may I say the fact that we passed a 4-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act at the last session of the Congress does not end this fight. So long as I have the pleasure and the privilege of representing an industrial State like West Virginia, so long as I continue to serve them in the Congress, I am going to see to it, if at all possible, that the economy of my State of West Virginia is not ruined by this kind of policy.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. OLIVER. I, too, associate myself with the gentleman in the comments and observations he has made this afternoon. I believe he mentioned Maine in several instances. I concur in what he has said; namely, that we, too, are suffering in the textile industry tremendously because of foreign importations. I commend the gentleman on what he has said and associate myself with him.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman. I appreciate very much his feeling. I know the problems in the gentleman's State of Maine are somewhat similar to our problems in West Virginia.

Mr. HARMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARMON. As all of you know, I am from Indiana. I happen to be with General Motors, the Delco Battery Corp. Unless we have automobile business we do not have too much success in the battery business. Our cities in Indiana have been hurt very much in the past months. We still have much unemployment. I never see a foreign automobile pass down the street but what I think how many of my people are going without food. I wholeheartedly agree with the gentleman from West Virginia that there must be something done, and I agree with everything he has said today.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad to know about that situation in Indiana. Just as a matter of information, may I state to the gentleman from Indiana that 8 years ago we were employing 125,000 miners in the State of West Virginia. Today we are employing 41,000. While some of that unemployment is due to automation, 50 percent of it is due to the raiding of our soft-coal markets by cheap residual oil with no restrictions on it. Every time I hear some talk about balancing the budget I am going to bring up different items from our trade policies to show that it is costing the United States in loss of import revenues plenty of money to balance the budget. Talk about plugging loopholes, the Committee on Ways and Means should plug some of them in our trade policy.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Garnishment of Salaries of Federal Employees

OF

HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill to provide for the garnishment, execution, or trustee process of wages and salaries of civil officers and employees of the United States.

Good government is based upon the theory that through the discipline of all members of a society the individual members of society gain rights and freedoms they did not possess before.

Regrettably many Federal employees have looked upon the power to garnish their salaries for a judgment debt as taking away certain rights and freedom they presently possess. Upon analysis, however, just the reverse is true. Because of the lack of discipline in this area Federal employees enjoy poorer credit ratings than do nongovernment employees who are subject to garnishment proceedings.

The reason for this is very apparent. The Federal employees who exercise self-discipline when it comes to paying their bills are paying the load for the license exercised by the small percentage of Federal employees who do not pay their bills. All Federal employees lose certain benefits to make up for the shortcomings of this small group.

The attitude of certain governmental bureaus against garnishment proceedings of Federal employees likewise is based upon a misconception of the true nature of the garnishment discipline. Certain bureau heads are of the opinion that handling garnishment proceedings would add to the work of the Federal agency garnished. They state they prefer to exercise discipline themselves over employees who fail to pay their bills. Most business executives will tell them from experience that the mere existence of the power of garnishment provides the best way for them to exercise voluntary discipline; so true is this that the use of the power of garnishment seldom has to be resorted to.

I am satisfied that an objective review of the time and effort spent by Federal agencies in trying to exercise the necessary discipline over their employees to pay their just bills will reveal that they could use to good advantage the existence of the power of garnishment in bringing their employees into line.

Certainly the power to garnish is much less harsh than the present power to discharge a Federal employee for nonpayment of bills. There needs to be this less harsh and intermediate power of garnishment to have a workable system.

Everyone benefits by the discipline of garnishment as we have learned long since in the nongovernmental sector of our society. The creditors will benefit. The Federal employees will find their credit rating is improved. The Federal administrators will find that the administrative time they have to spend on the failure of their employees to pay their bills will be lessened.

The bill follows:

A bill to provide for the garnishment, execution, or trustee process of wages and salaries of civil officers and employees of the United States

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the wages and salaries of all civil officers and employees, including Members of the Congress, the judiciary, and all other elected and appointed officers, of the United States, its instrumentalities and agencies, shall be subject to the remedies of garnishment, execution, and trustee process in the same manner as may be applicable in the case of wages or salaries due from private employers in the State or Territory in which is located the court wherein such remedies are sought, but said right of garnishment, execution, or trustee process shall be limited to and based upon a final judgment only after personal service upon the debtor and the writ, summons, and other process shall be accompanied by a certified copy of such judgment. The writ, summons, or other process shall be served personally or by registered mail upon the officer by or through whom the debtors wages or salaries are paid and the said writ, summons, or other process shall be accompanied, in addition to said certified copy of said judgment, by a statement under oath of the judgment creditor suing out such writ, summons, or other process that he is an original creditor of the debtor in such proceeding and that the judgment upon which such process is sought does not include interest in excess of 6 per centum per annum computed upon the original indebtedness. The said writ, summons, or other process shall likewise be accompanied by the sum of $2.50 if the judgment is $100 or less, and $5 if in excess of that amount, to be paid by the judgment creditor at the time of the service of said writ, summons, or other process to the officers so served for and on account of the United States and to be covered into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury. It shall be the duty of the officer so served as herein provided within thirty days from the service thereof, to respond to said writ, summons, or other process by causing to be delivered by registered mail or in person to the party designated, or to the officer specified in said writ, summons, or other process, a certificate stating the amount, if any, of the wages or salary due such officer or employee on date of service thereof, which amount shall be held subject to the further order of the court. Said certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated, but in no event shall a person so served be required to leave his office to testify in any proceeding hereunder: Provided, however, That there shall be deducted from said amount to be so certified such deductions from such wages or salary as may by law be authorized to be made. There shall also be deducted from said amount to be so certified, such amount as the debtor may have designated for purchase of war bonds under the plan of the department, agency, or organization in which the debtor is employed. It is provided further that such officer shall not be required to respond to more than one such writ, summons, or other process in any one calendar month in respect to the wages or salary of any debtor and that in the event more than one such writ, summons, or other process is served within such calendar month upon such officer in respect to the same debtor it shall be the duty of such officer to respond to the first of the writs, summons, or other process so served.

SEC. 2. (a) That the earnings, salary, insurance, annuities, or pension or retirement payments, not otherwise exempted, not to exceed $100 each month, of any person residing in such State or Territory, or of any person who earns the major portions of his or her livelihood in such State or Territory, regardless of place of residence, who provides the principal support of a family, for two months next preceding the issuing of any writ or process against him, from any court or officer of and in such State or Territory, shall be exempt from garnishment, execution, or trustee process, upon such writ or process, and the same shall not be seized, levied on, taken, or reached, by writ of garnishment, execution, trustee process, or any other process or proceedings of any court, judge, or other officer of and in such State or Territory: Provided, however, That where the husband and wife are living together, the aggregate of the earnings, salaries, insurance, annuities, and pension or retirement payments of the husband and wife shall be the amount which shall be determinative of the exemption of either in cases arising ex contractu.

(b) The earnings, salary, insurance, annuities, or pension or retirement payments, not otherwise exempted, not to exceed $60 each month for two months preceding the date of attachment of all persons residing in such State or Territory, or of persons who earn the major portions of their livelihood in such State or Territory, regardless of place of residence, who do not provide for the support of a family, shall be entitled to like exemption from garnishment, execution, or trustee process.

SEC. 3. The officer served as provided in section 1 shall cause to be delivered and paid over the amount of any wages or salary after deductions as provided in sections 1 and 2 of any such officer or employee aforesaid, in accordance with the order of the court or justice having jurisdiction in such proceeding, and any payment so made shall constitute a complete and valid acquittance of the United States for the amount of the wages or salary of any such officer or employee of the United States so paid.

SEC. 4. That the said right of garnishment, execution, or trustee process shall apply not only to civil officers and employees, including Members of the Congress, the judiciary, and all other elected and appointed officers of the United States, its instrumentalities and agencies, but also to employees of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That the term "Territory" as used in this act shall include political subdivisions of the United States of America.

SEC. 6. This act shall not affect, curtail, or in anywise limit the right of garnishment against officers or employees of Government owned or controlled corporations as such right now exists.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect immediately but shall not apply to a final judgment prior to the date of its approval.

President Steelman, members of the American Road Builders Association, and distinguished guests, it is a pleasure to be here and to have this opportunity to renew so many of the happy associations that developed during my work with you in the past 10 years. These have been warm and enduring relationships which I trust will remain, even though I have been impelled to withdraw from active participation as an officer of the association. And you may be assured that the work of the ARBA, and the development of our Nation's highway system will always be matters of the most fundamental interest and concern to me.

I am sincerely sorry I was not here earlier to hear the excellent addresses by the able Senator from New Mexico, Senator CHAVEZ, the chairman of the Senate Public Works Committee, and also the address by Senator FRANCIS CASE, a longtime advocate of improved highways. A former House colleague, Representative GEORGE FALLON, of Maryland, was also a distinguished speaker, as was Representative WILLIAM C. CRAMER, of Florida.

It is pleasant being in the home State of two outstanding Americans, Speaker SAM RAYBURN and Senate Leader LYNDON JOHNSON. They are positive in their efforts to build a better America.

Today, although I intend to talk in part about our roads, I am going to discuss them in the context of the general topic, "the Citizen Looks at Government."

As most of you may know, I recently completed a political campaign of almost 8 months' duration for the unexpired term of the late Senator Matthew M. Neely. During that period, I traveled the highways and byways of West Virginia and talked with thousands of my fellow citizens. And I may say quite categorically that there is no substitute for a grassroots campaign in sounding the sentiments of the people.

The framers of our Constitution took this fact into consideration when they established a House of Representatives to be elected every 2 years, their theory being that the House, whose Members must counsel with the citizenry every 2 years, would thus be most responsive to the needs and the will of the electorate. Although the technological development of our communications and transportation systems have, in part, eliminated this distinction between the two Houses of the Congress, the political campaign is still a vital part of the educative process in a democracy, for the candidate no less than for the electorate.

I wish, therefore, to share with you some of the observations and reflections coined from my experiences of recent months. It is not too early to appraise the meaning of the last election. But when I say that, I am not implying any use of partisan political rhetoric. I wish to go beyond such terms to a consideration of the needs of the citizen in relation to the nature of a democratic society itself.

And, in this inquiry, it would be well for us to remember that democracy is still a rather new experiment in the history of mankind—one that has by no means embraced the loyalties of people throughout the world. We who live within the democratic tradition—we who maintain faith in the dignity of the individual—are still a minority of the human race, and it is not written in the stars nor in words of fire across the sky that our way will prevail. Our endurance will be due to our imagination, our intelligence, and our will—not to some benevolent cosmic force in history which protects us from ourselves.

In viewing our topic in generic terms we find that certain material and spiritual conditions must be satisfied in order to develop and maintain a democratic society:

First. A minimum level of material prosperity must be achieved, sufficient to fulfill the basic needs of the populace—the need for food, shelter, clothing, employment, and provision for tomorrow.

Second. An adequate system of communication, transportation, and information must be maintained in order to assure the operation of a free and informed public consensus. In the city-state of ancient Athens the scope of democracy was defined by the range of the orator's voice. This fact, in itself, should preclude any casual comparison between the Greek democracies and our own.

And, the third condition that must be satisfied is an intellectual and spiritual one—the belief that men and women are capable of being governed by reason and good will.

These are the minimal conditions of a democracy. Now, what bearing do these generalizations have on our discussion today and the findings of the recent compaign? In brief, we may state the answer in these terms:

Although the conditions necessary for a democratic society—as I have outlined them—are universal, the way these conditions are satisfied varies with the complexity of the society and the state of its technology. This, in turn, affects the citizen's view of his government's responsibility.

Thus, in a dynamic society such as ours, these conditions are in constant flux—a flux which calls for persistent and continuous reexamination of the role of government itself. I shall, therefore, use the conditions of the State of West Virginia as a laboratory example of the kind of reexamination necessary, and the degree of governmental responsibility the citizen expects.

President Lincoln and other great statesmen and political philosophers have defined the functions of government as doing that for the individual which he could not do for himself. Thus, 100 years ago, with still half a continent virtually unsettled—with free land available for the taking—the Government did not need then to concern itself with problems of unemployment, social security, retirement benefits, etc.

The hardy men and women who pioneered West Virginia— as well as the rest of America—were well able to provide for themselves from the fertile land they settled, and the close-knit family group provided for its own aged.

But what of today? Their descendants who work the coal mines of West Virginia are no less hardy than their fathers and grandfathers. But they are less independent—and through no fault of their own. They now are part of an immense industrial complex which they cannot control—an industry, the condition of which is controlled by the technology of our society as a whole, the development of new fuels, new blast furnaces for steel, and new ways of producing power, to name only a few changes.

The production of coal, incidentally, in West Virginia declined from 150 million tons in the year 1957 to a gross production of only 112 million tons in 1958.

In 1948 there were 125,000 persons who labored in the coal mines of my State. But, by 1957, coal industry employment dropped to 58,000—and as of December 15, 1958, there were only 47,000 men working in the coal mines of West Virginia.

It is not surprising, therefore, that in all of the polls taken during the Senate campaign in West Virginia the issue overriding all others in the minds of the voters was the recession and the problem of unemployment. At the present time, when we are being told that the Nation is pulling out of the recession, and business is on the road upward, in West Virginia approximately 15 percent of the labor force remains unemployed, and 300,000 people of the State are living on surplus food commodities, or are eligible to receive these Government surplus food items.

Self-righteous talk about stern measures of economy in Government thus means little to able-bodied men and women who have the will to work but are denied the opportunity. Nor is this a problem that confronts the people of West Virginia alone—as the recent figures in the rise of unemployment testify.

We are, indeed, faced with the ironic and anomalous situation of a nation at the peak of its productive capacity impelled to give thought, as a result of technological advancements, to impending unemployment in many sectors of its productive system—in the mines, in the steel industry, in the automotive industry, and in agriculture.

And this, I reiterate, is a responsibility of government, for we are here concerned with the survival of a democratic society—a concern which cuts through party divisions or questions of moderate or liberal or conservative political philosphies.

I do not choose to be considered a prophet of doom and gloom—a Cassandra reading in the flight of birds the downfall of our society. But democracy means a certain condition of morale among the people—a condition in which the citizen walks upright, assured of his own dignity as an individual. A jobless man, whose family lives by sufferance rather than by right, does not long retain his sense of strength and freedom. And a democratic society cannot long afford the erosion of morale that follows.

Thus, through Federal planning and Federal action, as was quite clearly implied in the Full Employment Act of 1946, we must assure the material conditions of democracy by maintaining full employment. Such a view is not the product of liberal sentimentality, nor Christian charity, nor socialistic theory—it is the product of a hardheaded regard for what is necessary for our survival—and an acknowledgment that we have the material resources if we but have the imagination, the intelligence, and the will to use them.

Turning now to the second set of conditions I mentioned earlier—the need for an adequate system of transportation, communication, and information—it is interesting to note that these factors also weighed heavily in the minds of the West Virginia voters. In the same polls that showed unemployment as the chief issue, the second-ranking issue was invariably either the improvement of roads or schools. In both respects the citizen looks to the Federal Government for a contribution to the solution of the problem.

As most of you know, I have for many years been convinced of the vital importance of transportation—all forms—to the development of our expanding Nation. And of all forms, none is more important than our highway system. For highway transport not only supplements every other form of transportation, but it makes available to us the wealth of choices in where we live and work and seek our recreation.

It is important, also, to be reminded that many of the educational advancements of recent years—that have been achieved through our consolidated schools—have been made possible by an improved highway system.

It is worth considering, as well, that an adequate highway network which provides farm-to-market roads might do much toward easing the plight of the independent farmer who has contributed so much to the quality of American life. Indeed, a balanced highway program is one that not only provides for interstate superhighways between cities, but, also, for other primary arteries, and a large network of secondary roads that serve mining, agriculture, and other rural industry.

When I was a Member of the Congress in 1944, serving the sixth of my seven consecutive terms, the Federal-Aid Highway Act of that year authorized and designated 40,000 miles of a National System of Interstate Highways, but only the regular Federal-aid funds were available from the Federal Government to finance its construction. Such limited funds, of course, were utterly inadequate to complete the much-needed development in any reasonable time.

By 1956, as you are aware, Congress was in a position to pass legislation establishing a long-range program for improving the Interstate System and authorized $25 billion, to become available over a period of 13 years. The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 also stepped up the regular Federal-aid highway program—often now referred to as the ABC program.

These funds, which must be matched 50-50 with State funds, are available for the improvement of two Federal-aid systems and their extension into urban areas—the 250,000-mile Federal-aid primary system and the 528,000-mile Federal-aid secondary system.

Funds for the ABC program are generally authorized by the Congress every 2 years. These averaged $500 million for the first 9 years after World War II. But the 1956 act stepped these funds up to $850 million for the fiscal year 1958, and to $875 million for fiscal 1959. Then came the 1958 Federal-Aid Highway Act, which increased the outlay to $900 million for fiscal 1960, and to $925 for fiscal 1961.

With such a large expansion as is anticipated, however, there must be close consultation between Federal, State, and local governmental agencies with the local citizenry to so plan our highway work that it will benefit local areas, rather than ruin tracts of land that would be useful for agrarian, industrial, and residential purposes.

As much as we need vast highway developments, we must do our utmost in careful planning to avoid strangling ourselves with our own improvements.

Equal in importance—in the minds of the citizen, as in the fate of the Nation—is the question of maintaining and improving our educational system in the face of the challenges of increasing population, and the growing complexities of technology and society itself.

Although the problem has recently been dramatized by our contest with Russia and the tremendous educational and scientific strides of our adversary, this contest did not create the problem. Nor should we attempt a solution by imitating the Russian example, as some have suggested.

For the greatness of a nation is shown in many ways—in its cultural and scientific achievements, in its moral responsibilities, in its art, in its national aspirations. But its ultimate strength lies in the quality of the individuals who comprise its living substance.

And the strength, the final strength, of these United States lies in our belief in the dignity of the individual, the belief that man should live in the light of reason, should exercise his own free choice, and should develop to the full the latent talents within him. To this end we have established our free public education system.

Our system is not designed merely to mold a select few into polished aristocrats of a preconceived pattern—as are the older systems of Europe; nor is it designed to make our young people servants of the state—as are the schools of Russia, China, and the satellite nations.

On the contrary, we have designated to our schools the chief responsibility for the development, in all our young people, of the emotional, moral, and intellectual capacities that will qualify them as responsible members of a democratic society.

If the schools have partially failed, as some would now maintain, it is in large measure because we, citizens and representatives alike, have failed also in providing sufficient support, moral and intellectual, as well as financial.

Forty-three million Americans—one out of every four go to school. On this basis, with the expected population in 1975 of over 222 million, our school population will have soared by that time to 55 million. While, according to the authoritative Rockefeller report, we now have 22 million in our elementary schools, by 1960–61 we will have 34 million. By 1969, high schools will be deluged with 50 to 70 percent more students than they can now accommodate; and by 1975, our colleges and universities will face at least a doubling and, in some cases, a tripling of present conditions.

To carry this tremendous burden we have, in the recent past, devoted only slightly more than 3½ percent of our gross national product. To refer again to the Rockefeller report, in 1955, with a gross national product of $391 billion, we spent—on both private and public education—a total of $14 billion, or 3.6 percent. According to the same source, the cost by 1967 will be $30 billion, or about 5 percent of an estimated gross national product of $600 billion.

To this end, more than 20 members of the Democratic majority, including myself, have joined in cosponsoring a bill introduced by Senator MURRAY, of Montana, to provide Federal support for the public schools. The bill, given the number S. 2 to indicate its high priority in the business of the Senate, authorizes assistance to the States for the purpose of helping to pay for school construction and increases in faculty salaries. Financial aid would be granted on a per capita basis of $25 per child the first year—to be increased $25 per year until the fourth year—at which time it would be stabilized at $100 per child per year. The total outlay would range from $1.1 billion the first year to $4.7 billion the fourth year—increasing thereafter with the rise in school population.

There are specific provisions in the measure guaranteeing local school board control, which is a necessary requirement.

This, if the bill is enacted into law, would be a significant contribution, but it would be no more than the national Government should do to fulfill its responsibility for what has become a national problem. But our efforts must not end here.

This should be only the beginning of a concerted program of mobilizing our resources, private as well as public, local as well as national, to assure our young people of the quality of education they deserve.

Equality of opportunity in education means not only the opportunity to be exposed to learning, but the opportunity to achieve excellence in the development of one's full potential. This, in turn, means that we cannot and must not sacrifice quality for quantity; we must have both. This will be an expensive business, one where there are no shortcuts or easy solutions, but surely the wealthiest Nation in history can afford whatever is required to preserve and utilize its most precious national resources—the hearts and minds of its youth.

It is no less true today than in Thomas Jefferson's time that the integrity of a democratic society rests upon an informed and intelligent citizenry—or, as Jefferson himself stated it, "The people are the only censors of their Governors; and even their errors will tend to keep these to the true principles of their institutions. * * * The way to prevent these irregular interpositions of the people, is to give them full information of their affairs through the channel of the public papers, and to contrive that those papers should penetrate the whole mass of the people."

These, then, are the necessary conditions of a democracy which the citizen looks to his Government to maintain:

A sufficient prosperity and employment level to satisfy the fundamental needs of the individual, an adequate communication and transportation system to maintain the vital flow of ideas and commerce, education of high quality and adequate quantity for our youth, and governmental practices that are responsive to the right of the citizen to participate in making those decisions which shape his or her own destiny.

Federal Employees: Time Off To Enable Them To Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to allow 2 hours' time off to Federal employees for the purpose of voting in person. My bill directs the head of each department, agency, or establishment in or under the executive branch of the Federal Government to excuse from duty each employee under his jurisdiction, without loss of pay or deduction from annual leave or loss of other employment benefit, for a period of 2 hours for the purpose of voting in person in primary or general election for Federal, State, or local office. Also, additional time may be granted when, in the discretion of the head of the department, it is necessary.

There was much confusion and difficulty in my own congressional district in the past election because of the conflict in the various regulations in effect concerning time allowed employees for voting. Federal employees were allowed only 1 hour, whereas other employees in the State of New York were given 2 hours off. A number of Federal employees got in touch with me and complained that they had difficulty in getting more than the hour off, and in some instances the additional time was denied them, although because of great distances they had to travel to their Federal jobs it was absolutely necessary for them to have the additional time requested. I presume this same situation must have prevailed in other areas as well.

Rather than leave the question of necessary voting time to the discretion of the heads of the Federal departments, provision for sufficient voting time should be made by law. In my opinion, at least 2 hours' time off should be granted Federal employees, to prevent any inability to exercise their franchise; this is only reasonable if our Federal employees are to be spared hardship. Surely they should be permitted to enjoy their privilege of voting, a right guaranteed them, without being penalized by the Federal Government, their employer.

OF
HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the Monitor, the official Catholic newspaper of the diocese of Trenton, N.J., is embarking on its sixth year of publication.

The fifth anniversary edition of this worthy newspaper was replete with reports of the widespread support the Monitor has received from the Roman Catholic community throughout Mercer and Burlington Counties. Indeed, the appreciation for the fine service the newspaper has performed has not been confined to members of Catholic congregations alone. Leaders of labor, business, and government have recognized that the invaluable information obtainable only in the Monitor of many of the varied affairs as well as the attitudes in the Catholic community has been of tremendous service not only to the members of the Catholic faith but to themselves as well.

No one can doubt that the official newspaper of the diocese has been supremely successful during its first 5 years, and the future of the Monitor is particularly promising now. Although its lay audience has been large, a drive is now under way for total support by the families of the diocese.

The Most Reverend George W. Ahr, the Bishop of Trenton, under whose auspices the Monitor was initiated, has sent an open letter on this circulation drive to everyone in the diocese. In his letter the bishop emphasized the value of the Monitor to the clergy and the laity alike through its dissemination of information to the people of the diocese.

Bishop Ahr declared that—

> In the Monitor the diocese has a newspaper of which we can all be proud. But more than that it is an efficient aid to the bishop and priests in their difficult task of bringing to you a wider knowledge of things Catholic, a deeper understanding of your holy faith, a more vigorous development of your life of grace.

The sixth anniversary edition of the Monitor once again reminds the people of the Fourth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent, of the great loss we all sustained with the tragic death of Msgr. Richard T. Crean in the fire which destroyed St. Mary's Cathedral. The good monsignor somehow found a place in his incredibly crowded schedule to foster the development of the Monitor and its further service to our people, along with many other fine things for the benefit of the people of our diocese and our State of New Jersey. Once more, an otherwise glorious milestone in our history is saddened by the fact that Monsignor Crean cannot be with us to observe the growth of the Monitor as a spiritual and moral force throughout our religious and lay community.

Annuities for Federal Employees Engaged in Hazardous Duties

OF
HON. LESTER HOLTZMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation in the House of Representatives to increase the amount of annuity for those employees of the Federal Government engaged in hazardous duties, whose annuities were not increased at the time Public Law 854 was passed October 1, 1956. Included in this class of employees are those of the Federal Government such as FBI agents, members of the Bureau of Prisons, Treasury enforcement officers, Customs enforcement agents, U.S. marshals, and employees of the Criminal Investigation Division of the Immigration Service, whose primary duties include the investigation, apprehension or detention of persons suspected or convicted of offenses against the criminal laws of the United States, or whose duties involve frequent direct contact with such persons.

In introducing this legislation, I call to the attention of my colleagues that in 1956 when Public Law 854 was enacted into law, the deduction from salaries of all Federal employees was increased from 6 to 6½ percent for payment into the civil service fund. Simultaneously with this increase the annuities of employees of the Federal Government was increased from 2 to 2½ percent. In spite of the fact that the employees performing hazardous duties were obligated to pay an additional one-half of 1 percent into the retirement fund they were unfairly omitted from the law which would increase their benefits the additional one-half of 1 percent.

To compound this inequity further, Public Law 85–157 was passed during the 2d session of the 85th Congress increasing the retirement annuities for employees in hazardous occupations for the District of Columbia. While legislation was introduced in the 85th Congress to rectify this inequity, the bill never saw the light of day and no action was taken thereupon.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to understand why this kind of injustice should be suffered to continue despite the fact that all other employees of the Federal Government are receiving increased retirement annuities. This bill will simply place those in the enumerated hazardous occupations on a par when they retire with those covered in the act cited as the Policemen's and Firemen's Retirement and Disability Act of 1957.

I am completely convinced that no Member of Congress will want to oppose this bill and I most respectfully urge my colleagues to give it a full measure of support.

A Bill To Assist in Relieving the Shortage of Housing for Elder Persons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to assist in relieving the shortage of housing for elderly persons which became part of the housing bills passed by both the Senate and House Banking and Currency Committees last year and, I am hopeful, will become part of the omnibus housing bill this year. However, in order to bring this matter to the attention of the House and Senate, I am introducing a separate bill along with the statement I made before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee at the time I suggested this bill as an amendment to the housing bill:

> A bill to amend the National Housing Act to assist in relieving the shortage of housing for elderly persons and to increase the supply of rental housing for elderly persons—it is the further purpose of this bill to assist in provision of urgently needed construction of nursing homes, renovation, and equipping existing licensed nursing homes for the care and treatment of persons, particularly elderly persons

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to carry out the purpose of this bill section 201(a), title II of the National Housing Act, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 229(a) The purpose of this section is to assist in relieving the shortage of housing for elderly persons and to increase the supply of rental housing for elderly persons. It is further the purpose of this bill to assist in the provision of urgently needed nursing homes for the care and treatment of persons, particularly elderly persons.

"For the purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'housing' means eight or more new or rehabilitated living units, not less than 50 per centum of which are specially designed for the use and occupancy of elderly persons;

"(2) The term 'elderly person' means any person, married or single, who is sixty years of age or more;

"(3) The term 'nursing home' means a facility which is or will be licensed or regulated by law, which provides continuous nursing care, under medical supervision or direction, to the long-term, convalescent, infirm, or elderly patient in a home-like atmosphere, furnishing facilities and comforts normally found in a patient's home, and which provides, in addition thereto, such specialized service, equipment, and safety features as may be required for the safe, proper, and adequate care of patients at all times; and

"(4) The terms 'mortgage', 'mortgagee', 'mortgagor', and 'maturity date' shall have the meanings respectively set forth in section 207 of this Act.

"(b) The Commissioner is authorized to insure any mortgage (including advances on mortgages during construction) in accordance with the provisions of this section upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe and to make commitments for insurance of such mortgages prior to the date of their execution or disbursement thereon.

"(c) To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage to provide housing for elderly persons shall—

"(1) involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $12,500,000 or, if executed by Federal or State instrumentalities, municipal corporate instrumentalities of one or more States, or nonprofit development or housing corporations restricted by Federal or State laws or regulations of State banking or insurance departments as to rents, charges, capital structures, rate of return, or methods of operation, not to exceed $50,000,000;

"(2) not exceed, for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use, $9,000 per dwelling unit: Provided, That the Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase the dollar amount limitation of $9,000 per unit to not to exceed $9,400 per unit to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures and may increase each of the foregoing dollar amount limitations by not to exceed $1,250 per room in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require;

"(3) if executed by a mortgagor which is a private nonprofit corporation or association or other acceptable private nonprofit organization regulated or supervised under Federal or State laws or by political subdivisions of States, or agencies thereof, or by the Commissioner under a regulatory agreement or otherwise, as to rents, charges, and methods of operation, in such form and in such manner as, in the opinion of the Commissioner, will effectuate the purpose of this section, involve a principal obligation not in excess of the amount which the Commissioner estimates will be the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner);

"(4) if executed by a mortgagor approved by the Commissioner but which is not a nonprofit organization, involve a principal obligation not in excess of the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner, but shall not include any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk): Provided, That the Commissioner may in his discretion require such mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to rents or sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return and methods of operation, and for such purpose the Commissioner may make contracts with and acquire for not to exceed $100 stock or interest in any such mortgagor as the Commissioner may deem necessary to render effective such restrictions or regulations; such stock or interest shall be paid for out of the section 207 Housing Insurance Fund and shall be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance;

"(5) provide for a complete amortization by periodic payments within such terms as the Commissioner shall prescribe;

"(6) bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 4½ per centum per annum on the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time;

"(7) cover a property or project which is approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction, with 50 per centum or more of the units therein specially designed for the use and occupancy of elderly persons in accordance with standards established by the Commissioner, and which may include such commercial and special facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants.

"(d) In order to carry out the purpose stated in the second sentence of subsection (a), the Commissioner is authorized to insure any mortgage which covers a new or rehabilitated nursing home, subject to the following conditions:

"(1) The mortgage shall be executed by a mortgagor approved by the Commissioner. The Commissioner may in his discretion, require any such mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to charges and methods of operation, and, in addition thereto, if the mortgagor is a corporate entity, as to capital structure and rate of return. As an aid to the regulation or restriction of any mortgagor with respect to any of the foregoing matters, the Commissioner may make such contracts with and/or acquire, for not to exceed $100, stock or interest in any such mortgagor as he may deem necessary. Any stock or interest so purchased shall be paid for out of the section 207 Housing Insurance Fund, and may be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance.

"(2) The mortgage shall involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $12,500,000, and not to exceed 75 per centum of the estimated value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed.

"(3) The mortgage shall—

"(i) provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such terms as the Commissioner shall prescribe; and

"(ii) bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 4½ per centum per annum of the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time.

"(e) In carrying out the provisions of this section with respect to the insurance of mortgages on properties or projects designed for use as nursing homes, the Commissioner shall consult with and secure the advice and recommendations of the Public Health Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

"(f) The Commissioner may consent to the release of a part or parts of the mortgaged property or project from the lien of any mortgage insured under this section upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, and shall prescribe such procedures as in his judgment are necessary to secure to elderly persons a preference or priority of opportunity to rent the dwellings included in such property or project.

"(g) The provisions of subsections (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (k), (l), (m), (n), and (p) of section 207 shall apply to mortgages insured under this section and all references therein to section 207 shall refer to this section."

(b) Section 212(a) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The provisions of this section shall also apply to the insurance of any mortgage under section 229 except that compliance with such provisions may be waived by the Federal Housing Commissioner in such cases or classes of cases in which laborers or mechanics, not otherwise employed at any time on the project, voluntarily donate their services without compensation for the purpose of lowering the costs of construction and the Federal Housing Commissioner determines that any amounts thereby saved are fully credited to the nonprofit corporation, association or other organization undertaking the construction."

SEC. 213. This bill shall take effect sixty days after this enactment.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS B. CURTIS, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MISSOURI

I first want to thank the chairman for the opportunity of testifying before the committee on this important subject of adequate facilities for the aged.

No subject seems to be receiving more attention today than the problems that face our older citizens. It is very important that their problems receive attention. Indeed, the point has been raised of what value has been this increased lifespan given to us through the achievements of our medical and pharmaceutical professions if the years added to the lives of our people are to be spent in unhappiness.

What should be one of the greatest boons to mankind has in some respects become a bane. I believe it is well within our power to give the boon real meaning. However, it requires some clear thinking of what should be done. What has been done, although done with good intentions, has often produced poor results.

The problem of the aged is to a large degree a financial problem. Most older people are on fixed incomes, pensions, social security, or retirement of some sort. Their plans for financing their retirement have been thrown out of kilter by two major economic and social forces.

1. Instead of living 10 years they now are living 20 years. This is the boon that has become a bane, because they have not prepared themselves for this financial burden. The cost of staying alive is great—unnecessarily great. The drugs and medical care are available, but their cost is burdensome.

2. Inflation has hit this group of people most cruelly. What they had set aside has been cut in half. Although we have sought to alleviate this damage through granting double personal exemptions to persons over 65 in our income tax laws, and in other ways, this has amounted to too little for those who get it and has been of no help to those in the lower economic brackets who do not have enough income to be on the income tax rolls.

One way in which we can help these older citizens is to analyze with some care just what their needs are and see if we cannot provide the facilities that are tailored to their needs. What we have been doing, I suggest, is trying to convert the facilities that already exist in our society to fit their needs or, equally as bad, to distort their needs to fit what facilities exist. This does not work, and it is costly.

Let me illustrate. Older people need more medical attention than younger people but do not need constant doctor care, nor do they need constant nursing care. Yet, ofttimes, they are confronted with the choice of either staying at home or going to a hospital. They do not need hospitalization. They need something much less expensive, something in between. The result is we tend to overload our hospitals and inadequately meet the needs of the aged and unnecessarily burden them financially.

I am going to make a confession. I was the first member of the male sex to serve on the board of the Visiting Nurses Association of St. Louis. I was deeply interested in the work that the visiting nurses were doing. I observed how their caseload had changed over the years. The primary caseload of the visiting nurses used to be instructing young mothers in prenatal and postnatal care, because most births took place in the homes and not in the hospitals. Today, there are very few maternity cases in the home. In place of maternity care, the visiting nurses now find their primary caseload is geriatrics—teaching the families of older people in the home how to care for the aged person in the home; how to administer a hypodermic shot; how to handle other problems of chronic illness or just old age.

I regret to state that the use of the visiting nurse approach, which is so much less costly than the hospital approach and much more suitable, has not received the attention and the development that it should. But it illustrates the point I am trying to make that facilities geared to the problems of the aged should be set up specifically for them rather than to try to make the aged problems fit into the facilities we have been using for the general society.

So I come to the specific question at hand—the encouragement and implementation of nursing homes designed to take care of the aged. As a matter of fact, the very terminology I am using—nursing homes—confesses that I am guilty of the very thing I am urging that we avoid. What we need is not nursing homes in the traditional way we know nursing homes to be. Nor do we need old folks' homes as we have known them. We need an entirely new type of facility. It may be a village of old folks, such as I have read has been established in Arizona. It may be just homes clustered around a medical facility that is set up to care for older people. Frankly, I am not certain just what kind of facilities we should be talking about.

And so we come closer to the question at hand. How do we go about providing the type of facilities that will most adequately fit the problem of our aged citizens? Do we do it by establishing a commission to study the matter, or a congressional committee? All this may help, but I suggest that there is a more direct way, a quicker way, a more satisfactory way—indeed, a way which is being followed to some extent in the natural course of events, whether the Government is aware of it or not.

The way is the private enterprise system. What Government should be doing is encouraging what is already coming about.

So many people misunderstand the private enterprise system. To me it is essentially a trail-and-error system, a system which permits individual citizens or groups of citizens to follow out their ideas of how to sell to or service certain social needs. The best way I know to provide adequate facilities to the older people is to allow various people to go ahead and provide what they think the older people would like at the price they can best afford to pay.

Ninety-seven percent of the nursing homes for the aged today are private institutions. These institutions are under State regulations, and the regulations are improving as experience with the operation of nursing homes grows. All that is needed now is to give some encouragement to private enterprise to move more effectively into the area of administering to the needs of our aged people. The Federal Government is in a very logical position to do just this through the FHA program.

I am familiar with the testimony of George T. Mustin, the head of the American Nursing Home Association, before your committee on May 14, 1958. I want to endorse what he has said wholeheartedly.

I believe that in this area the most can be done for the money to assist our older people, and this can be done right now. The plans, thousands of them, are in existence; all they need is financial implementation. Why we have not extended the FHA program to include private nursing homes before now is hard for me to understand. These are not fly-by-night operations. They all must qualify under State standards. Indeed, the Federal Government through the use of FHA funds can encourage the growth of the State-approved "Nestorian" facilities—I am coining a new term; Nester was the respected older citizen in Homer's "Iliad"—and give impetus to the growth of qualified private facilities for our older citizens.

I urge this committee to give consideration to amending S. 3497, an act to expand the public facility loan program of the Community Facilities Administration of the Housing and Home Finance Agency or whatever proposed legislation would be most appropriate to include proprietary Nestorian facilities that meet adequate State standards.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Permanent Extension of Special School Milk Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT H. QUIE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, recently I introduced a bill to permanently extend a program which has great significance to the health of our schoolchildren—the special school milk program. I might add that this program also has a great bearing on the economic health of the dairy industry.

Congress has been appropriating the sum of $75 million a year for the maintenance of this program. Under the present utilization system in our schools, this appropriation is sufficient through fiscal 1959.

Beginning on July 1, 1959, however, there is need of an increased appropriation or the program will need to be curtailed.

The value of healthful milk to the diet of our schoolchildren can hardly be overestimated. This program insures that every American child, regardless of the financial status of his parents or guardians, will not need to be deprived of nature's most nearly perfect food.

I believe I speak for millions of schoolchildren and their parents when I say that this is one program of which Congress can be proud. Scarcely a year goes by when research does not uncover more evidence to bolster the contention of modern science that milk is a vital food for children and adults.

Milk furnishes the human body with 100 different nutrients—including a tremendous assortment of vitamins, minerals, fats, sugars, and high-quality proteins. It is a fact that milk is essential for three nutrients that many nutritionists advise in quantities larger than many people consume.

But it is for three inherent nutrients that milk is justly famous.

Milk provides mineral calcium which is needed throughout life for healthy bones.

Milk provides B-vitamin riboflavin which is essential for healthy skin and nerves which enables the body cells to use other nutrients carried to them by the blood.

And milk dispenses protein which is the main building-and-repair material of all tissues in the body.

Many people receive all too little of these three nutrients. It is of major importance that our children receive them, and the best way to insure this is to see that they drink plenty of milk.

This is why the special school milk program has a great stake in our country's future—because it deals with the bodily welfare of our Nation's youth. Every investment we make in the health of our schoolchildren will certainly result in a stronger America for the future.

Mr. Speaker, I urge favorable consideration of this legislation.

The Space Challenge

OF
HON. DAVID S. KING
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Speaker, while I am deeply pleased to be a member of the Committee on Science and Astronautics, I am also greatly sobered by the gravity of this assignment. I believe that this committee, despite its newness, bears one of the heaviest responsibilities of our time.

Overtaking the Russians in space will be no easy task, but I am confident the United States has the capacity to accomplish it. We will not do it with the checkbook alone. We will not do it with anything short of a maximum effort in every relevant area of human activity.

The astronautical challenge has been widely described as the space race. This is an apt expression. We Americans must realize that what we are engaged in is, in every sense of the word, a race.

Speed and time are essential elements of every race. We must recognize their particular importance in this race.

A distinguished Philadelphia scientist, Dr. I. M. Levitt, said, in an Associated Press story which appeared in the Washington Star, that by 1980 men may be living in plastic-domed villages on the moon. Imagine, if you will, how quickly 1980 will be upon us. In my memory I find it no more than a quick step back to the outbreak of World War II, which was almost 20 years ago. Within a similar span men could be living on the moon.

Dr. Levitt, who is the director of the Fels Planetarium at Franklin Institute, said, in fact, that his estimate of 1980 may be too conservative. With another breakthrough in our progress in nuclear energy, and with atomic fuels installed in space vehicles, men, he said, could put settlements on the moon even sooner.

This is indeed a sobering possibility.

It is even more sobering to ponder the possibility that the men who settle the moon might be Russians—perhaps only Russians. We do not need Dr. Levitt to tell us—as he has—that control of the moon by a hostile military power will give that power an alarming logistic advantage.

Clearly, time has favored the Russians up to now. Experts agree they have a substantial lead in space. Exactly how wide the gap is, no one knows. But certainly the Russians, believing as they do about the importance of space leadership to their goal of world supremacy, will never willingly allow that gap to be closed, and their advantage lost.

In a race which runs just 20 years, and perhaps less, in its first important heat—in what actually may be the only important heat—a handicap of a year is plainly critical. A gap of 3 years could be insurmountable.

I see a parallel between the race in space and the contest on the seas which engaged the world in the 15th and 16th centuries, climaxed by the colonization of the Americas.

The exploits of Columbus and Magellan, which proved the earth round, opened great frontiers to exploration and development. Spain and England had the imagination to recognize the political, military and economic importance of these frontiers, and set out to conquer them. By their unremitting efforts to colonize and develop the New World, England and Spain became formidable sea powers, and fixed for themselves places of eminence in global affairs for several centuries.

The New World today is space.

Concern about whether the American people are taking this challenge seriously enough is not mine alone. I am certain it is shared by my congressional colleagues, as well as by many other American citizens. Unfortunately, there are, however, many who do not share it.

Alan T. Waterman, Director of the National Science Foundation, has voiced deep concern about American apathy toward the space race. In a United Press International story carried by the Washington Post, Mr. Waterman was quoted as saying:

> As a Nation, we appear to forget that we live in a competitive world and shall continue to do so. It seems abundantly clear that we shall rapidly lose in competition unless we can show more determined and constructive efforts than we have during the past years.

Mr. Waterman deplored the post-sputnik response of the American public. He warned that other countries, and especially Russia, are showing a determination and a national spirit on the part of the people which seems to be relatively absent from the American scene.

> We do not seem to understand—

He said in the article—> that it will be impossible to maintain our own prosperity and world peace unless we do and do promptly the things necessary to compete in a modern world.

He went on to say that American educators who have toured Russia have been alarmed at the clarity of purpose they find there. He said the Russians believe that by winning the race in space, and by emphasizing science and education, they will achieve leadership over the entire world, and without the cost of a destructive war.

As Mr. Waterman points out, the Soviet challenge really is more than a race in space. It is a contest in technology, whose fruitage is not only better space vehicles, but better bathtubs and better automobiles. This reflects, of course, a more basic contest in education.

Our answer to this challenge must be the effective use of those qualities and resources which have enabled Americans to successfully meet every other crisis in their history; namely, imagination, initiative, and ingenuity.

These qualities are inherent in, and cultivated by, our democratic way of life. They are the bread and butter of our free enterprise system.

The society which cultivates and nurtures these qualities in the greatest abundance is, in reality, the truly liberal society. I am confident our society has, and always will have, these qualities in greater abundance than is possible in any regimented Communist society.

And with them, Americans can win the space race.

We will win it, if we will but cease to grumble about the challenge, put aside our partisanship and our doubts, and apply our best brainwork and teamwork—along with the proper measures of elbow grease and midnight oil—to the task.

Address by Hon. Vance Hartke, of Indiana, Before the National Political Science Conference on Urban Problems

OF
HON. ALAN BIBLE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, on Friday, January 16, the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] gave a very thought-provoking speech on urban problems before the National Political Science Honorary and Citizens Conference on Washington Area Problems, at the American University in Washington.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the speech entitled "National Policy for Urban America" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am honored that you have asked me to speak to such a distinguished gathering. Let me make it clear that, as a freshman—a Senator, I do not want to be presumptuous. Let me add also that I do not claim to be an expert. However, as a former mayor who is now operating in higher echelons of government, I have had some experience along the lines which you folks have been discussing.

Problems of our cities can't be explored too deeply or too often. But we must do more than explore. We have to prepare to act, then act.

It is concerning the role of Federal Government in helping promote effective action for a better way of life for our urban citizens that I speak tonight.

Before continuing with this talk, "National Policy for Urban America," I want to take note of something that happened to me just 2 days ago.

As you may know, I have been appointed to the District of Columbia Committee. Now, some Senators, frankly, do not consider this a choice assignment. However, I am as pleased with the challenge this committee offers as I am with my appointment to the Finance and Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committees, which are considered major appointments.

You see, I am pleased that the Senate leadership has considered my experience as mayor of Evansville, Ind., valuable background for this work here. I consider the challenge of helping wipe out slums and traffic bottlenecks in the Nation's Capital as important—or more so—as the challenge I felt in facing these problems in Evansville.

I hope I can help bring better government to Washington. And I hope to have a part in bringing local self-government to the presently voteless residents of the District.

In addition to Washington, we have 167 metropolitan areas in our country, ranging in size from Macon, Ga., and my own city of Evansville, Ind., to the multi-million-sized centers of New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago. Around 80 percent of these metropolitan areas now have fewer than half a million inhabitants.

In the next few years, we're going to have many more metropolitan areas. By the year 2000, we are told, some 235 million persons will be living in these metropolitan areas alone in our country.

Cities which now have between 100,000 and 200,000 residents will grow far beyond their present boundaries. These areas offer us opportunity. We have opportunity to help them avoid the problems that have ravaged our largest cities.

Somehow, the meaning of population and growth figures is so simple it has escaped us. Cities, which once served as service areas for the countryside, now dominate the landscape and our civilization.

The figures are impressive. They're almost frightening. But the full significance comes in translating the figures into problems of real impact on the cities and their people.

For those of us who must travel to work in such areas and who use municipal services, metropolitan growth problems are personal problems.

But, the implications and the size of urban growth can hardly be classed as something strictly local. It is statewide. It is interstate. Indeed it is national.

The new swift means of getting from place to place, the way in which our people move from one place to another, have made the problems national in impact. Transportation needs, requirements for huge quantities of water, national defense needs, all of these have made it unrealistic to talk of metropolitan problems in terms of one community or as something less than a national situation.

With two out of three American citizens already living in metropolitan centers, no single level of government alone possesses the organization, the funds or the leadership to cope with the problem.

The sad truth is governments have not been equipped to handle the metropolitan problem. They have not been able to, or have been unwilling to, anticipate the changes which our century has brought to cities.

The impact of the car is a good example. We have been unable to move fast enough or with enough determination to prevent the problems brought to our cities by 60 million cars on their streets.

Yet, cars are simple things compared to jet planes and helicopters. They're simple compared to automation and atomic power. All of these more complicated instruments will probably be in common use in another 50 years.

We can anticipate their use and the problems they may create just as we could have anticipated the impact of the car. But if we can't turn this anticipation into action our problems will multiply. That is because we still haven't solved exhaust pollution, street congestion, and roadbuilding. On top of this we know we can expect air-transport congestion and prospects of pollution and waste disposal from atomic sources.

What's more, there will be a mass of leisure time which automation is bound to bring.

To date we have not used mobility as something creative. Instead, we have let it too often be a noose for strangulation as well as a force for growth and opportunity.

The challenge of these new scientific and technological developments lies not alone in making out life more productive, but in making it more fruitful and more decent. Why must we go through growing pains of technological advancement when advances can be anticipated?

Let's gear our policies to change and to the warning signs. As a nation, we have never been adverse to experimenting in Government programs and organizations. Indeed, our representative democracy is itself an experiment not yet in full flower.

The problems of this new technology are focused on our cities. The products of the mines, the fields, the factories, the laboratories, and of the cultural heritage of this country are stored in our cities.

Our cities are rich.

Rich in material things. Rich in human resources.

They are themselves important resources.

Our cities are our latest frontier. Unless outer space can be substituted for green space and parking space, the cities may be our last frontier.

Like earlier frontiers, our cities have been settled, exploited, and somewhat eroded. Continuing this patern means degrading the lives of millions. Yet, our goal should be continuous raising of human dignity. This is impossible in the midst of urban erosion.

Rising crime rates, social diseases, juvenile delinquency, segregation, filthy living conditions flourish partly because of uncontrolled or poorly controlled urban growth and population management.

Out in the countryside our rural residents learned some of these lessons long ago. They found out conservation is essential to growth.

Soil conservation, for instance, is widespread and national in scope. Yet, there is almost no urban conservation program.

If we can work to save and restore the resources that God has given us, surely we ought to be able to do the same with resources that have been largely of our own making. The spectacle of urban growth, then, requires anticipating needs of citizens for applying technological achievements to make life better through them. It requires stopping erosion and restoring its effects.

First, we must anticipate the problems we will soon face. I refer to anticipation in the full, active sense of the word.

Let us mobilize, for instance, all the sources of information on city problems and funnel this information into a policy. Right now the Federal Government has programs in urban renewal, highways, flood control, water and land management, economic aid, housing, school construction, and law enforcement, all of which are designed to help cities.

But there is a sad lack of coordination among these programs, just to mention a few. What's more, many cities aren't even aware of what help is available or how to get it.

Similar programs are being carried forward on other levels of government without being dovetailed with Federal programs.

They cannot be divorced. A highway linking two major cities has in itself impact on commercial and residential growth, on relocation of residents, even on crime rates. Urban renewal is related to transportation, to water supplies, to sanitation facilities, to law enforcement. All are tied into the expanding economy of the Nation. All are part of the defense system in supplying the goods and getting the goods delivered, as well as to a better standard for us to hold up as a model to our friends and allies.

We need to anticipate the net effect of these programs on specific places.

For instance, a community needs to know how, if at all, it may benefit from the distress-areas bills and from highway legislation. In Evansville, for instance, we found that by pushing a sewer-development program ahead at an accelerated pace we were able to get around $250,000 in Federal funds for planning.

To gage how well needs of individual cities are being met by existing legislation, each metropolitan area has to be studied and the national implications weighed. To do this means local, regional, and national planning.

Many conferences on metropolitan problems are held every year. But these efforts are not coordinated. So far as I know, no one community has mobilized all the forces available to cope with its problems, let alone any such national mobilization.

The Federal Government, it seems to me, can provide the incentive to pool information, talent, energy, and resources to focus attention on metropolitan problems and suggested solutions. It can help anticipate and plan. It can help gain public support and understanding.

Existing agencies might be called on to analyze present programs and their net effect, adding how these programs can be used in other places.

There also is a need for reviewing the relationship of these programs at the top level. The Council of Economic Advisers should be concerned with a new dimension in our complex economic situation—the probable consequences of trends on our civilization. Or, put another way, where are we likely to end up if we continue on the same road?

The council could perhaps tell us where this production is, from what markets and to what markets do products flow, what the effect of certain policies will be, and developments on the opportunity for a full life for citizens.

The Budget Bureau or some other agency of the executive could well review programs for urban growth and see that these are meshed in such a way as to spread their benefits. We have books on farms and their products and on such things as jobs. Why not on our cities?

It should, indeed, be the business of all agencies to report on implications to our people of new scientific developments. This could be done through urban research in the National Academy of Science or some similar group.

Such a group could make information available to local groups such as the metropolitan study group of Washington. Pooling and sharing of information then would be possible. Cities could learn from each other from an agency trying to store knowledge on problems and possible new problems.

But this anticipation and presentation is only the first phase.

We must also plan.

Now is the time for a long-range program to pool brains, energy, money, and experience which is being frittered away in separate meetings, conferences, and institutes.

It should be a goal to keep talking about problems and also to start doing something about them.

I refer to setting goals in welfare, public works, transportation, water supply, sanitation, decontamination, living standards, defense, communication, recreation, and many more. I refer also to setting up requirements to meet needs which can also serve as a yardstick to measure local achievement.

Along these lines, I understand the best guess for residential renewal requirements is $700 billion or 10 percent of the gross national product between now and 1970. The same estimate calls for quadrupling present outlays for these purposes. Yet, national urban renewal plans now propose only spending 10 percent of this amount.

Going too slowly is not economy. It isn't fair to those who suffer the consequences. We can afford what is necessary, surely. Just as surely as we cannot afford a thing that is not necessary.

But how are we to judge? If our information is correct, we are spending no more than 3 percent of what we are told is needed.

But we also need to know the effects of these goals on other programs for urban development. And we have few standards on which to base judgment.

We face similar problems in transportation and water resource development. We must project effects of present programs and anticipated needs if we are to make even an educated guess. And, with the size of the problems we have and will have, guessing ought to be reduced to a minimum.

The Federal Government should serve two-thirds of its citizens by helping them with information for rational decisions. This calls for looking into all policies affecting urban life, highways, housing, urban renewal, water supply, stream pollution, etc., to find out if they measure up to our obligations.

After anticipating and planning to meet anticipation, we must set up adequate standards.

These can be set up only with understanding of problems and with plans that require local areas to measure up. Again the Federal Government can supply both initiative in presentation and resources to accomplish the goals. It can set a pattern for planning and it can set standards.

By publicizing the problem, it can give aid to new values for the new way of life. If our cities are the just brunt of public scorn, it is a national disgrace that they should continue to be when most of our people live in them. The very vitality of democratic government is at stake in the rebuilding of our cities. If democracy fails to meet these urban problems, how can we hold out our system as one for others to follow?

Our culture, oddly, has two images of city life. One is that of Sodom and Gomorrah. The other is that of the Heavenly City.

If many of us cling to the idea that cities are dens of iniquity, we may get little more than that from many of our cities. I believe, however, from experience in Evansville, that we can raise our cities to new stature and prestige. To do otherwise is to allow erosion of great material and spiritual resources.

Our cities must provide highest standards of convenience, efficiency, service, and beauty. If they do, the cities can become monuments to our civilization. If we don't, the cities may become our tombstones.

Third, we must spell out our standards and plans in a strategy for urban development. To be meaningful, this strategy should have national leadership. I believe this can be furnished by National Government.

It could use its resources to coordinate the plans I spoke of. It could use scientific information resources to analyze trends in growth and development and the implications. It could help spell out, with all the minds and skill available everywhere, objectives and goals and standards.

This could be done through a White House conference. A joint congressional-Presidential commission is another way. Revitalizing and revamping National Resources Planning Council or some other group is another way.

We need information, digesting of this information, analysis of statistics. Without these, there can be no review of implications, no evaluations, no setting of standards.

Then these goals must be implemented. There are, perhaps, two interim approaches for constructive criticism.

We certainly can see the need for more land. And we can see the need for conservation of present resources.

Let's learn again from the farmer. We need something like an urban land bank to acquire in urban areas land for future expansion. This may take Federal assistance at least until State legislatures release cities from 18th century financial straitjackets.

Perhaps we can use a city agent—someone who can help cities help themselves as the county agent does for rural America.

Urban growth is a fact. Our metropolitan living is the dominant way of life. We can't escape it.

I know of no domestic problem which does not have a bearing on the problems of urban growth.

The solution is not one of capability. It is not one of lack of brainpower. And it certainly is not one that can be shoved from one level of government to another as someone else's problem.

It is the problem of all of us.

We cannot afford the price of undue delay.

We must develop national policy. To do so, we must plan, set standards, spell out the standards with strategy for accomplishment. Then we must provide the machinery and money to realize the goals.

In all this, we must not lose sight of the greatest goal—human dignity of high order for all.

I think it can be done.

I think we can come a little closer at least to the "heavenly city."

If we don't try, we may come closer to hell on earth.

A Bill To Amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 To Provide a Special Method of Taxation for Real Estate Investment Trusts

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a special method of taxation for real estate investment trusts. This particular bill was reported favorably during the last session of Congress by our Ways and Means Committee but unfortunately did not pass Congress. This bill provides substantially the same tax treatment for real estate investment trusts as present law provides for regulated investment companies. Real estate trusts are organizations specializing in investments in real estate and real estate mortgages, while the regulated investment companies specialize in investments in stocks and securities. Under present law regulated investment companies which distribute 90 percent or more of their ordinary income are taxed only on their retained earnings. Thus, the distributed earnings of these companies are taxed only to the shareholders. This same type of tax treatment is accorded by this bill to real estate trusts.

Mr. Speaker, the equality of tax treatment between the beneficiaries of real estate trusts and the shareholders of regulated investment companies is desirable since in both cases the methods of investment constitute pooling arrangements whereby small investors can secure advantages normally available only to those with larger resources. These advantages include the spreading of the risk of loss by the greater diversification of investment which can be secured through the pooling arrangements; the opportunity to secure the benefits of expert investment counsel; and the means of collectively financing projects which the investors could not undertake singly.

In addition to providing equality of tax treatment between the trust beneficiaries and the investment company shareholders, I believe it is also desirable and so did the Ways and Means Committee to remove taxation to the extent possible as a factor in determining the relative size of investments in stocks and securities on the one hand, and real estate equities and mortgages on the other. This is particularly important at the present time because of the countrywide complaints about the shortage of private capital and mortgage money for individual homes, apartment houses, office buildings, factories, and hotels. At the present time the financing of these real estate equities and mortgages is dependent largely on Government-guaranteed money, and investments by special groups, such as insurance companies and pension trusts.

The text of the bill follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subchapter M of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to regulated investment companies) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"PART II—REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUSTS

"Sec. 856. Definition of real estate investment trusts.
"Sec. 857. Taxation of real estate investment trusts and their beneficiaries.
"Sec. 858. Limitations applicable to dividends received from real estate investment trust.
"Sec. 859. Dividends paid by real estate investment trust after close of taxable year.

"SEC. 856. Definition of real estate investment trust.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this subtitle, the term 'real estate investment trust' means an unincorporated trust or an unincorporated association—

"(1) which is managed by one or more trustees;

"(2) the beneficial ownership of which is evidenced by transferable shares, or by transferable certificates of beneficial interest;

"(3) which (but for the provisions of this part) would be taxable as a domestic corporation;

"(4) which does not hold any property primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of its trade or business;

"(5) the beneficial ownership of which is held by 100 or more persons, and no 5 individuals own (directly or indirectly) more than 50 percent of such beneficial ownership; and

"(6) which meets the requirements of subsection (b).

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—A trust or association shall not be considered a real estate investment trust for any taxable year unless—

"(1) It files with its return for the taxable year an election to be a real estate investment trust or has made such election for a previous taxable year which began after December 31, 1956.

"(2) At least 90 percent of its gross income is derived from—

"(A) dividends;

"(B) interest;

"(C) rents from real property;

"(D) gain from the sale or other disposition of stock, securities, and real property (including interests in real property and interests in mortgages on real property); and

"(E) abatements and refunds of taxes on real property.

"(3) At least 60 percent of its gross income is derived from—

"(A) rents from real property;

"(B) interest on obligations secured by mortgages on real estate;

"(C) gain from the sale or other disposition of real property (including interests in real property and interests in mortgages on real property);

"(D) dividend or other distributions on, and gain from the sale or other disposition of, transferable shares in (or transferable certificates of beneficial interest in) other real estate trusts or associations; and

"(E) abatements and refunds of taxes on real property.

"(4) The amount by which the gains from the sales and other dispositions of stock or securities held for less than 6 months exceed the losses from such sales or other dispositions is an amount less than 30 percent of its gross income.

"(5) The amount by which the gains from voluntary sales and other voluntary dispositions of real property held for less than 5 years exceed the losses from such sales and dispositions is an amount less than 30 percent of its gross income.

"(c) RENTS FROM REAL PROPERTY DEFINED: For purposes of paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (b), the term 'rents from real property' does not include—

"(1) any amount received or accrued with respect to any real property, if the trust or association makes any expenditure which is properly allocable to such real property while rented (or to the rentals from such real property), other than—

"(A) expenditures properly chargeable to capital account;

"(B) expenditures for taxes, interest, or insurance;

"(C) expenditures for the collection of, or the accounting for, income; and

"(D) expenditures properly allocable to the entering into, renewal, or termination of any lease;

"(2) any amount received or accrued with respect to any real property, if the amount to be derived from such property depends in whole or in part on the income or profits derived by any person from such property (except that any amount so received or accrued shall not be excluded from the term 'rents from real property' solely by reason of being based on a fixed percentage or percentages of receipts or sales);

"(3) any amount received or accrued directly or indirectly from any person if the trust or association owns, directly or indirectly—

"(A) in the case of any person which is a corporation, stock of such person possessing 10 percent or more of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote, or 10 percent or more of the total number of shares of all classes of stock of such person; or

"(B) in the case of any person which is not a corporation, an interest of 10 percent or more in the business, assets, or net profits of such person.

For purposes of paragraph (3) of this subsection, the rules prescribed by section 318(a) for determining the ownership of stock shall apply in determining the ownership of stock, business, assets, or net profits of any person. For purposes of the preceding sentence, section 318(a)(2)(C) shall be applied without regard to the 50 percent limitation contained therein.

"SEC. 857. Taxation of real estate investment trusts and their beneficiaries.

"(a) REQUIREMENTS APPLICABLE TO REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUSTS.—The provisions of this part shall not apply to a real estate investment trust for a taxable year unless—

"(1) it distributes to its shareholders or holders of beneficial interests an amount not less than 90 percent of the amount by which the real estate investment trust taxable income for the taxable year exceeds the sum of its net long-term capital gain and net short-term capital gain for such year; and

"(2) the real estate investment trust complies for such year with regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate for the purpose of ascertaining the actual ownership of the shares or certificates of beneficial interest of such trust.

"(b) METHOD OF TAXATION OF REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUSTS AND HOLDERS OF SHARES OR CERTIFICATES OF BENEFICIAL INTEREST.—

"(1) IMPOSITION OF NORMAL TAX AND SURTAX ON REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUSTS: There is hereby imposed for each taxable year on the real estate investment trust taxable income of every real estate investment trust a normal tax and surtax computed as provided in section 11, as though the real estate investment trust taxable income were the taxable income referred to in section 11. For purposes of computing the normal tax under section 11, the taxable income and the dividends paid deduction of such real estate investment trust for the taxable year (computed without regard to capital gain dividends) shall be reduced by the deduction provided by section 242 (relating to partially tax-exempt interest).

"(2) REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST TAXABLE INCOME: For purposes of this part, the term 'real estate investment trust taxable income' means the taxable income of the real estate investment trust, adjusted as follows:

"(A) There shall be excluded the excess, if any, of the net long-term capital gain over the net short-term capital loss.

"(B) The deductions for corporations provided in part VIII (except section 248) in subchapter B (section 241 and following, relating to the deduction for dividends received, etc.) shall not be allowed.

"(C) A deduction shall be allowed for the dividends (other than capital gain dividends) paid during the taxable year computed in accordance with the rules provided in section 562.

"(D) The taxable income shall be computed without regard to section 443 (b) (relating to computation of tax on change of annual accounting period).

"(E) The net operating loss deduction provided in section 172 shall not be allowed.

"(3) CAPITAL GAINS.—

"(A) IMPOSITION OF TAX: There is hereby imposed for each taxable year in the case of every real estate investment trust a tax of 25 percent of the excess, if any, of the net long-term capital gain over the sum of—

"(i) the net short-term capital loss; and

"(ii) the amount of capital gain dividends paid during the taxable year.

For the purposes of this subparagraph, the amount of dividends paid shall be computed under the rules provided in section 562.

"(B) TREATMENT OF CAPITAL GAIN DIVIDENDS BY SHAREHOLDERS: A capital gain dividend shall be treated by the shareholders or holders of beneficial interests as a gain from the sale or exchange of a capital asset held for more than 6 months.

"(C) DEFINITION OF CAPITAL GAIN DIVIDEND: For purposes of this part, a capital gain dividend is any dividend, or part thereof, which is designated by the real estate investment trust as a capital gain dividend in a written notice mailed to its shareholders or holders of beneficial interests at any time before the expiration of 30 days after the close of its taxable year. If the aggregate amount so designated with respect to a taxable year of the trust (including capital gain dividends paid after the close of the taxable year described in section 859) is greater than the excess of the net long-term capital gain over the net short-term capital loss of the taxable year, the portion of each distribution which shall be a capital gain dividend shall be only that proportion of the amount so designated which such excess of the net long-term capital gain over the net short-term capital loss bears to the aggregate amount so designated.

"(c) EARNINGS AND PROFITS: The earnings and profits of a real estate investment trust for any taxable year (but not its accumulated earnings and profits) shall not be reduced by any amount which is not allowable as a deduction in computing its taxable income for such taxable year.

"SEC. 858. Limitations applicable to dividends received from real estate investment trust.

"(a) CAPITAL GAIN DIVIDEND: For purposes of section 34(a) (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals), section 116 (relating to an exclusion for dividends received by individuals), and section 243 (relating to deductions for dividends received by corporations), a capital gain dividend (as defined in section 857(b)(3)(C) received from a real estate investment trust shall not be considered as a dividend.

"(b) OTHER DIVIDENDS:

"(1) GENERAL RULE: In the case of a dividend received from a real estate investment trust (other than a dividend to which subsection (a) applies)—

"(A) if such real estate investment trust meets the requirements of sections 856 and 857(a) for the taxable year during which it paid such dividend; and

"(B) the aggregate dividends received by such trust during such taxable year are less than 75 percent of its gross income, then, in computing the credit under section 34(a), the exclusion under section 116, and the deduction under section 243, there shall be taken into account only that portion of the dividend which bears the same ratio to the amount of such dividend as the aggregate dividends received by such trust during such taxable year bear to its gross income for such taxable year.

"(2) NOTICE TO SHAREHOLDERS: A real estate investment trust to which paragraph (1) applies for any taxable year shall, in a written notice to shareholders or holders of beneficial interests mailed not later than 30 days after the close of the taxable year, designate the portion of the dividends paid by the real estate investment trust during such taxable year which may be taken into account under paragraph (1) for purposes of the credit under section 34, the exclusion under section 116, and the deduction under section 243.

"(3) DEFINITIONS: For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) The term 'gross income' does not include gain from the sale or other disposition of stock or securities or of real estate (or interests therein).

"(B) The term 'aggregate dividends received' includes only dividends received from domestic corporations other than dividends described in section 116(b) (relating to dividends excluded from gross income). In determining the amount of any dividend for purposes of this subparagraph, the rules provided in section 116(c) (relating to certain distributions) shall apply.

"SEC. 859. Dividends paid by real estate investment trust after close of taxable year.

"(a) GENERAL RULE: For purposes of this chapter, if a real estate investment trust—

"(1) declares a dividend before the time prescribed by law for the filing of its return for a taxable year (including the period of any extension of time granted for filing such return); and

"(2) distributes the amount of such dividend to shareholders or holders of beneficial interests in the 12-month period following the close of such taxable year and not later than the date of the first regular dividend payment made after such declaration, the amount so declared and distributed shall, to the extent the trust elects in such return in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his designee, be considered as having been paid during such taxable year, except as provided in subsections (b) and (c).

"(b) RECEIPT BY SHAREHOLDER: Amounts to which subsection (a) applies shall be treated as received by the shareholder or holder of a beneficial interest in the taxable year in which the distribution is made.

"(c) NOTICE TO SHAREHOLDERS: In the case of amounts to which subsection (a) applies, any notice to shareholders or holders of beneficial interests required under this part with respect to such amounts shall be made not later than 30 days after the close of the taxable year in which the distribution is made."

"If America Forgets Where She Came From, if the People Lose Sight of What Brought Them Along, Then Will Begin the Dissolution," Carl Sandburg, Biographer of Abraham Lincoln, Declares

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 21, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished Lincoln scholar, Carl Sandburg, poet and philosopher, wrote in his book "Remembrance Rock" that—

> If America forgets where she came from, if the people lose sight of what brought them along, if she listens to the deniers and mockers, then will begin the rot and dissolution.

Surely, the inspiration to be derived from the great lessons of the past which are set forth in our rich heritage of historic American sites, buildings, objects, and antiquities is of the utmost significance and importance in guiding the present as well as future generations toward similar high standards and worthy attainments.

With this thought in mind, legislation to save this cultural heritage has been sponsored by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WIDNALL], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], myself, and no doubt others.

The need for such legislation, Mr. Speaker, was first made evident by the protests of the Federal Commission of Fine Arts, the American Institute of Architects, the National Trust for Historic Preservation, the Society of Architectural Historians, the National Park Service, the New York Times and many other newspapers, as well as a large number of groups interested in conservation of our resources.

In introducing his companion bill the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT] declared that—

> Studies by these groups and by others have made it obvious that literally thousands of the most priceless treasures of our national heritage have been plowed under and utterly destroyed by the bulldozers of a ruthless progress during the past few years. The tragedy is that in most such instances, the destruction was wholly unnecessary. The valuable historic objects could have been preserved without retarding progress.
> We obviously should not permit this thoughtless and wanton destruction of these last relics of our past, because they provide, in many cases, the only visible links to connect us with periods of our own national history. They remind us of the greatness of our past, of the hardships endured by those who with such painstaking care laid the foundations of our history.

Congress has, in the past, enacted legislation to preserve historic American sites, buildings, objects, and antiquities. I would cite, in this connection, the act entitled "An act for the preservation of American antiquities," approved June 8, 1906—United States Code, title 16, sections 431, 432, 433; the act entitled "An act to provide for the preservation of historic American sites, buildings, objects, and antiquities, and for other purposes," approved August 21, 1935—United States Code, title 16, section 461 and the following; and section 7 of the act of August 27, 1935, as added July 18, 1940—United States Code, title 40, section 304a–2.

Certainly, the intent of the Congress is clear enough in this matter. It clearly intended to preserve our heritage, but the present administration has chosen repeatedly to ignore the intent of the Congress.

It recommended to Congress that the historic Civil Service building, in Washington, D.C., designed by Robert Mills, architect of the U.S. Treasury Department Building and Washington Monument, be destroyed in order that the site could be used as a parking lot.

It recommended that the historic State, War, Navy Building in the Nation's Capital be replaced with what it described as a more efficient modern building.

Morristown, N.J., National Historical Park has been threatened with a federally assisted highway, 90 percent of the cost of which is furnished by the Federal Government.

It proposed to survey some 30 historic buildings across the country preparatory to replacing them with more efficient office space, too. Obviously, these recommendations were part of a plan to reward builders who were faithful to the Republican Party with fat contracts.

But this is not the end of this sorry tale, Mr. Speaker.

A number of historic buildings dating back to the Revolutionary period, including the ancestral homes of the Lee family of Virginia, are right now in danger of being obliterated to make way for the new Chantilly Airport. These homes should be preserved and, if necessary, relocated.

The old San Francisco Mint, one of the few buildings to survive the earthquake and fire of 1906, a classic building of great historic and architectural value, has been declared surplus by the General Services Administration. The site is wanted for a parking lot.

A historic Dutch mansion, built around 1790, was acquired by the Government along with the surrounding land on the Hudson River for a Veterans' Administration hospital. This building certainly could have been preserved on the site as a museum and used as a waiting cottage for visitors. Instead, it was sold to a wrecker for $32. The wrecker dismantled it, sold the facade for $3,000 and disposed of the remainder in piecemeal sales.

It is to be hoped that the Committee on Public Works, and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs will move rapidly to consider the legislation dealing with the preservation of our great heritage which has been referred to them and that they will favorably report this legislation to the Congress early in this session. There is no time to lose, particularly in view of the fact that the administration obviously considers that the legislation previously enacted by the Congress does not apply to it.

I include here two items which gives some idea of the scope of the problem which I have been discussing.

WANTON DISREGARD OF OUR HERITAGE

An architect visiting West Point a few years ago was admiring the superintendent's residence, beautifully situated to command a sweeping view of the West Point plain. The oldest building still being used at the Academy, this one has housed almost every Superintendent, and so has historic as well as architectural value.

"We're tearing it down for more barracks room," an officer told him matter-of-factly.

The architect was horrified. Couldn't it possibly be saved? No, the plans were made.

The visitor hastened to Washington and buttonholed Congressmen and Senators, but could interest none. Then he had an inpiration: he called on Senator HARRY F. BYRD of Virginia. "Senator," he said, "did you know that Gen. Robert E. Lee's famous home while he was Superintendent of West Point is about to be destroyed?"

The Senator was incredulous. "Get me West Point," he said to his secretary. No one will give a verbatim report of the ensuing conversation, but the destruction plans were canceled and today this architectural landmark still stands, used and admired.

The patriotic architect is but one of many Americans who are alarmed at the wanton razing of places precious to our heritage. All over the country structures that help recreate our past are being sacrificed to make way for shopping centers, superhighways, skyscrapers and subtopias. Studies indicate that at least 25 percent of the finest historic and architectural monuments that existed in the United States in 1941 have been destroyed.

Much of this destruction is the result of callous disregard of cultural values. Residents of Charleston, S.C., used to point with pride to their Orphan House Chapel, designed in 1802 by Gabriel Manigault, one of the finest of early American architects. Culturally it was of national importance and when a mail-order house acquired it along with other property for a retail store, Charlestonians begged the company to spare the charming chapel. But it was destroyed to enlarge the parking lot.

Boscobel, a classical mansion dating from 1804, was considered one of the most distinguished examples of Hudson River architecture. Located in Westchester County, N.Y., on the grounds of the Franklin D. Roosevelt Veterans Hospital, it was in rapidly deteriorating condition in 1950. Despite local efforts to save it, Government officials declared it surplus property and sold it for $35 to a wrecker, who tore it down.

Even in ruin it was beautiful. Admirers of the old house raised enough money to purchase the dismantled structure and move it, piece by piece, to a 30-acre park site at Garrison, N.Y. There it lies today, while devoted sponsors go about the heartbreaking job of collecting funds to reconstruct the mansion as a community center and museum of Hudson Valley history and art.

Why save old places? What can they contribute to living in the world today?

A nation with no regard for its past will have little future worth remembering. We need authentic, tangible reminders of our national virtues and heroes to make us feel a part of the best in our heritage. Properly presented, they breathe life into past experience. The most cleverly illustrated children's book cannot compare with the Farmers' Museum at Coopertown, N.Y., for example, as a means of giving boys and girls the feel of rural living before the Civil War. The housewife churning and cooking, weavers fashioning fabric from wool or flax, the brawny blacksmith working red-hot iron, the country storekeeper cutting into a generous head of cheese—all create a vivid picture of the industrious men and women of the time. City youngsters are enchanted by Cooperstown's farm animals, the team of sleek brown oxen pulling a cart, the parade of gray geese and goslings. A morning there is not merely a history lesson, but an unforgettable taste of early America.

Historic preservation speaks to the spirit. In 1942 an Army private wrote to John D. Rockefeller, Jr., about his visit to colonial Williamsburg: "Of all the sights I have seen and the books I have read, none ever made me sense the greatness of this country with more force and clarity than when I saw Williamsburg slumbering peacefully on its old foundations."

Williamsburg and Cooperstown are famous. But many a lesser known locality, taking a fresh perspective of its past, is finding an old courthouse or residence, even a covered bridge or a tavern, that is rich in historical associations. How can such sites be preserved?

Deciding just which structure to select, how to raise the money to save it and present it to the public is a baffling job for amateurs. Fortunately they can get advice from the National Trust for Historic Preservation, a private, nonprofit organization supported entirely by patriotic individuals and organizations. Anyone can join. Chartered by act of Congress in 1949, it owns a number of historical properties, but its chief task is encouraging and guiding other groups over the country. Its president, Richard Hubbard Howland, is an architectural historian, and he and his staff of five experts are continually at work advising townspeople how to make the most of their best. More than 250 preservation organizations are affiliated with the National Trust and support its programs in their own areas. Trust services are rendered by mail or by on-the-spot consultation.

A number of cities have put entire areas under architectural control. Charleston, S.C., started it in 1924 by passing an ordinance creating the Old and Historic Charleston District. Since then, New Orleans has preserved the Vieux Carré, Boston has set aside Beacon Hill, Washington has protected Old Georgetown, and Natchez has made her finest architectural area inviolate. The National Trust has stimulated this activity in dozens of cities by distributing copies of model ordinances, and publishing regular reports of new legislation.

The National Trust helped bring to life the Mississippi River town of Galena, Ill., once a busy lead-mining center. A century ago as many as 18 steamers loaded and unloaded at its levees at one time; Joseph Jefferson performed and Jenny Lind sang there. Galena gave the Union its most distinguished general, Ulysses S. Grant.

But as the years passed, traffic left the river for the highways. The lead mines failed. The town sank into oblivion, and its young people drifted away. Today it has one-third the population it boasted in 1858.

Four years ago, when the National Trust held its annual meeting in Chicago, members were invited to visit Galena. They were enchanted to find an almost untouched antebellum town on steep hills with a wonderful river view. But the General Grant home was shabby and dominated by a souvenir stand peddling tawdry tourist trinkets.

A careful restoration of the home was started; the famous Market House was saved from becoming a parking lot, and Galena's last remaining old firehouse, built in 1836, was restored. By last November 200,000 people had visited the once sleepy town, and Galena had opened a productive mine of tourist gold.

Historic homes can retain their charm and still be put to good everyday use. In Washington, D.C., when three handsome buildings of the Federal style were about to be torn down for a parking lot, a group of neighbors formed Historic Georgetown, Inc., an organization designed to prove that preservation will pay. They sold stock at a dollar a share, bought the buildings and leased them to a restaurateur, a florist, and an interior decorator.

D'Estrehan Plantation House in Louisiana, built in 1787 and remodeled in 1840 in the style of the Greek revival, was one of the finest homes overlooking the Mississippi River. An oil company took it over. But instead of destroying this beautiful reminder of our 18th century agricultural economy, the 20th century technologists restored it. They now use it for administrative offices.

As the experience of Galena and many other towns testifies, preservation can be good business. A recent Government survey shows that an average of only 28 tourists a day visiting a town with historic attractions will bring in as much money during a year as a new business with a $100,000 annual payroll.

The true preservationist, however, is not motivated by money. His is the spirit of Ann Pamela Cunningham, the South Carolina woman who almost singlehandedly saved the proudest prize of all our past—Mount Vernon. Washington's home was in sad disrepair and in danger of falling into ruin when she formed the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association. In 1858 the association bought the historic place for $200,000 and restored it as a national shrine.

Now is the time for every town to take stock and determine what is most worth preserving. As Lewis Mumford has said, "The concrete cloverleaf is becoming our national flower." In the next few years 41,000 miles of new highwsys will charge through some of our last surviving wilderness areas, through major cities, along historic old roadways. Many communities may not attempt to save their historic places until it is too late.

How can you tell what to save? Here are a few touchstones which the National Trust suggests be applied to any building or site.

1. Is it of substantial historical or cultural importance to your community, State, or Nation? It could be a mansion, a pioneer's squared-log cabin, a sod house or even an Indian mound.

2. Is it suitable, that is, is it accessible to the public and in presentable condition? Generally speaking, say the experts, it is better to preserve than repair, better to repair than restore, better to restore than reconstruct.

3. Can you maintain it, once you've bought it? Few places can sustain themselves from admission fees. If yours cannot, and is not fully endowed or otherwise self-sustaining, perhaps it can be adapted to use by an organization or business firm without losing its significance.

If we can save enough of the homes, churches, courthouses and other places where Americans who went before us lived and worked, we can sense their way of life, their ideals and character. We want our children to sense them, too. Unless we act now, few of these firsthand lessons from the past will remain.

NATIONAL TRUST FOR HISTORIC PRESERVATION,
Washington, D.C., February 1959.

To: Members and friends of the National Trust for Historic Preservation.
From: Richard H. Howland, president.
Subject: United States Mint in San Francisco.

On February 18, at 2 p.m., on the third floor of the Public Health Building, in the Civic Center in San Francisco, a public hearing has been arranged to permit interested organizations and individuals to express their views on the preservation of the old mint. This hearing is of utmost concern, not alone to those who wish to see this nationally significant architectural monument preserved, but to all who realize the threat it poses to the legal basis of preservation as defined in certain Federal laws.

By a wise provision of the act of August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 885), as amended July 18, 1940 (54 Stat. 764); 40 U.S.C., 1952 edition, section 304a–2, the Administrator of General Services is authorized to demolish any building declared surplus to the needs of the Government. Before proceeding with demolition he is to inform the Secretary of the Interior in writing of his intention to demolish it, and shall not proceed to do so until he has received written notice from the Secretary of the Interior that the building is not of national significance.

Between April 23, 1956, and August 23, 1957, eight buildings were referred for opinion to the Secretary of the Interior, and only one, the San Francisco Mint, was given the nationally significant designation, in a report dated December 6, 1956. It was then agreed that the building would be turned over to the National Park Service as a national historic site for their administration. An item in the 1959 budget provides for its renovation as headquarters for the Western Division of the National Park Service, which includes five Western States, Alaska, and Hawaii. The offices now occupy expensive rented space in the city. It would also provide for museum exhibits telling the story of the San Francisco Mint, its importance in the financial history of the country, of the process of coinage, and of the valor and courage of the citizens of San Francisco as exemplified by the heroic efforts of those who saved it in 1906.

City officials have asked their Representatives in Congress to disregard the evaluation of the Secretary of the Interior, and the provision of the law for Federal responsibility for preserving its nationally significant structures, and demolish the building (at an estimated cost of at least $250,000) to return the site to the city for private development as a parking lot or building site.

The American Institute of Architects, the Society of Architectural Historians, and the National Trust for Historic Preservation have also rated the Old Mint as one of the few notable historic buildings and architectural monuments in the city of San Francisco. Its demolition at this time would be a short-sighted waste of our national heritage, and one that the future could only regard with deep regret. Rehabilitated, it could become one of the city's major tourist attractions, and an incentive for redevelopment of the area surrounding it.

In other great cities, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis, and Providence, major efforts are being made to preserve many buildings of less distinction. It has been repeatedly demonstrated by careful study that such historic attractions bring to the areas that save them a larger share of the $20 billion annual tourist business.

Culturally, the old mint built in 1873, is accepted as one of only three or four important buildings in San Francisco to survive the fire and earthquake of 1906, and one of the finest examples of 19th century Federal architecture in the West. It was designed by the great A. B. Mullett, leading architect of Government buildings of the post Civil War era. Writing of its value to the city, State, and Nation, Stephen W. Jacobs, president of the Pacific section of the Society of Architectural Historians stated: "The San Francisco Mint, of Columbia bluestone with a classical portico of Rocklin granite, has retained its characteristic setting with cast iron fence and fountains, and beds of greenery. The integration of the tall chimneys at the rear, which served as flues for the metal retorts, gives the whole complex an unusual and striking character. On the interior, the high ceilings and the vaults of brick on iron beams retain the early type of Federal construction which represented a pioneering attempt at structural engineering and fireproofing. Its massive construction enabled the mint employees to save the building and the $200 million it contained during the 1906 fire, when a 7-hour battle was fought by mint employees and soldiers with a single, 1-inch fire hose to keep at bay the flames gnawing at its barred and iron-shuttered windows. One of the best surviving examples of Government architecture sponsored by Jefferson and Jackson in the early days of the Republic, the old mint is probably the only building in San Francisco famous throughout the country for its design character."

"San Francisco is unusually fortunate that the Federal Government has retained this building and is willing to restore it and maintain it in an eminently suitable way at no expense to the city," Mr. Jacobs stated in another report. "It seems almost incredible that the city does not realize how lucky it is to have what is perhaps its most important architectural monument maintained at no expense to it. * * * There is every reason why the old mint should remain one of our principal monuments and a memorial of San Francisco's unique history."

David E. Finley, chairman of the board of trustees of the National Trust, in a letter to the Administrator of General Services Administration stated the Federal responsibility for observing the spirit as well as the letter of the law governing demolition of nationally significant structures in January 1957, "The preservation of this building is important not only because of its intrinsic merits but also in order that the Government may set an example for the preservation of important historic monuments."

On January 23, 1959, at a meeting of the full board of trustees of the National Trust held in Washington, a resolution was passed again sustaining the cogent reasons for preservation of the Old Mint, and instructing us to communicate to our concerned members and member organizations an appeal for their support. We are accordingly asking our member organizations to send representatives to the meeting of February 18, and for individuals to attend the hearings if possible, also. May we urge that you write your Congressman sending copies to City Planning Commission, City Hall, San Francisco, Calif.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Vasyl Olynyk, Orthodox Consistory, Youngstown, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, amen.

Almighty Father, who has brought us here together today, hear our prayers now humbly offered unto Thee, and be merciful to us; for our souls trust in Thee, and in the shadow of Thy wings have we taken refuge.

On this 41st anniversary of the establishment of the Ukrainian National Republic, and the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the union of the Ukrainian States, we, the children of that suffering nation, are mindful that Thou alone, O Lord, can grant us and all captive nations everlasting freedom. Come, O Lord, and defend the motherless and the oppressed, that the men of earth may no more oppress. Deliver us from our enemies, and protect us from them that have risen up against us.

Almighty God, in this new home, in these blessed United States of America, we, Thy creatures, have found peace and security. We praise Thy holy name, and heartily beseech Thee today to defend our liberties, and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Endue with the spirit of wisdom those to whom, in Thy name, the authority of government has been entrusted, that there may be justice in this land, and in Thy whole world—good will and peace.

All this we ask through Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FLOOD CONTROL IN MAD RIVER-BUCK CREEK VALLEYS, OHIO

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Springfield area of my district was hit by a disastrous flood along Mad River and Buck Creek. As a result, a number of industrial plants have been inundated, hundreds of thousands—and perhaps millions—of dollars worth of machinery has been damaged, and several thousand people have been put out of work in a community which already has had more than its share of economic troubles, and is now designated as a depressed labor area.

More than 10 years ago I started action in the Congress to get a flood control project to protect the industrial sections in and near Springfield from flood waters. The House Committee on Public Works authorized a study and survey by the Corps of Army Engineers of the whole flood control problem in the Mad River-Buck Creek Valleys, and the necessary funds were appropriated therefor. Despite the action of Congress, this matter dragged along over a number of years, until finally, in late 1957, or early 1958, the Army engineers made a report to the effect they did not believe the estimated expenditure of some $6 million to put in a proper flood control installation was justified, because, according to a chart submitted with the report, there would not be another disastrous flood in that area for approximately 100 years. All of this, of course, despite the fact that there have been quite a number of very damaging floods in that area during the past few years.

When the Army engineers' report was made I commented in the Rules Committee of the House that I did not believe the Corps of Engineers was omnipotent and could tell or predict when another flood would come. The flood of yesterday and today has proven that the Army engineers did not know as much about when rains would come, and floods would result, as God Almighty.

I have today prevailed upon the Corps of Army Engineers to send an engineer into the Springfield area to see with his own eyes that we have had a flood there and that great damage has been done to many industries, factories, and equipment, resulting in thousands of people being put out of work.

I am informed that in order to get a further study and review of the need for this whole flood control project in the Mad River-Buck Creek valleys of Ohio, it may be necessary to introduce a new authorizing resolution for the consideration by the House Public Works Committee. This I expect to do, if necessary, with the promised cooperation of the Corps of Army Engineers, at the earliest possible moment. I hope all Members of this House will find it possible to support this resolution.

REREFERENCE OF BILL

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 772) and that the bill may be rereferred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CONGRESSIONAL ORIENTATION PROGRAM

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, as the newly elected representative of the people of the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Indiana, I am taking 1 minute of the time of the House this morning, both to introduce myself to those of my colleagues whose hand I have not had the opportunity to shake and to express my sincere appreciation to all those who contributed to the recently concluded congressional orientation program.

I have not the slightest doubt that the information and background which I have acquired as a result of these congressional seminars will assist me greatly in my immediate understanding of the legislative procedure, thereby enabling me to be of greater service to the people of the Sixth District, and also having the honor to represent them in a manner most faithful to the customs of the House of Representatives.

My special thanks to the bipartisan organizers, Representatives Baldwin, Coffin, Elliott, Ford, Frelinghuysen, Fulton, Price, and Udall; to House Parliamentarian Lewis Deschler; and to all participating organizations, including the Foreign Policy Clearing House, the American Political Science Association, and the Brookings Institution.

Indeed, it is quite refreshing and pleasing to me to realize that these people are so interested in improving the efficiency of this particular branch of the Congress by imparting their knowledge, freely, without regard to partisan division.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, 41 years ago this January 22, the millions of people in the Ukraine came out of the First World War with national independence and freedom.

They had paid the high price, in invasion, blood and struggle, that is usually exacted when a national and cultural group achieves its independence. And the people of the Ukraine were not destined to be able, for the moment, to hold on to what they had gained.

They had known many centuries of conflict with Moscow—and later with what was then called St. Petersburg. And once again they were invaded by Moscow's armies, sacrificed by the hundreds of thousands in the desperate effort of the Bolshevik leaders to compel history to conform to their theories about it. They fell once again under the domination of a police state more grim and terroristic than the czarist state they had escaped.

They died again by the hundreds of thousands in the terrible famine of 1932, when Soviet agriculture was savagely imposed on their nation in still another effort to distort into crimes the desire of Ukrainian peasants and farmers to live their lives in peace and security.

They died again when the Nazi armies swept through the Ukraine in 1941 and 1942, and their country was a battleground of total destruction for 4 dreadful years.

There is a Soviet fiction that the Ukraine today is a free republic, with all the attributes of sovereignty including a diplomatic service, and that she remains in the Soviet system as a matter of choice and free will. The pretense is as ugly as the suppression 2½ years ago of the Hungarian revolt, and it is false.

More than 40 million people in the Ukraine share the common desire of the captive and satellite peoples of Eastern Europe for freedom and self-determination.

They share the common desire of human beings for human rights, for the privilege of managing their own affairs, of worshiping God according to the way of their fathers and their own choice.

It may be the duty of responsible persons to conduct negotiations with the Soviets, and there is no reproach in the performance of duty. But our people have the right to remember, as well, that no progress is possible in a police state, that neither peace nor security is possible in a police state with all its appurtenances of censorship and individual persecutions.

Empires founded upon tyranny are not safe neighbors and they are not noted for generosity to those within their power that long for escape.

It is fitting that on this anniversary of a happier day, the American people express their sympathy for the captives of the Ukraine.

THE NORFOLK SCHOOL SITUATION

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, the situation in Norfolk, Va., which is depriving 10,000 of the Nation's youth of their birthright—the right to a free public education—is one of the most shocking events of our time. Although the cause of the situation is of grave concern to me, that is not what prompts me to address the House today.

As a result of the closing of schools in Norfolk, some 3,000 children of servicemen and other Federal personnel, who are in the area, not by choice, but to preserve our security and insure the public welfare, are being denied their educational birthright.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this situation, if permitted to continue, will constitute a serious breach of our moral responsibility. Therefore, I am today introducing a measure to remedy the situation.

The question to which I am addressing myself here today is not the rights of States to maintain such school systems as they see fit. If a State chooses to have no public school system at all, indefensible as that position may be, that is not the question now before us. My particular concern here today is the situation which requires children who live in these States for reasons beyond their control, to suffer academically because of the folly of the leaders of those States. This is the matter which concerns me and concerns many of my colleagues, I know.

I would like to read in part from a letter I received on December 3, 1958, from the wife of a naval aviation technician from Waterville, Ohio, now stationed in Norfolk:

> My husband has been in the Navy for 18 years. Our daughter is 13 years old and in the 9th grade. None of the junior or senior high schools in Norfolk opened this year.
> Is there any way possible that my husband could be transferred to another State so that our daughter will be able to attend school?

A week after I took the matter up with the Navy Department I received a report which read in part as follows:

> The Secretary of the Navy fully realizes the seriousness of the educational situation in Norfolk and is aware of the Navy's responsibility to provide facilities for the education of Navy dependents where such facilities do not exist. The matter is under study and you will be further advised when a decision is reached.

The letter goes on to say:

> I am certain you will understand that it would be impractical to order from Norfolk all personnel having children of school age, and that to make an exception in Mr. Bryan's case would be unfair.

I continued to probe the situation and on Saturday, December 13, I noted a front-page article in the Washington Post and Times Herald which stated that the Navy was seeking Federal funds to finance the schooling of Navy children in Norfolk. According to the news story, these funds had been requested under the Federal-aid-to-impacted-areas statute, Public Law 874, but there appeared to be considerable uncertainty regarding the applicability of this statute because many of the schools which might have been eligible for such funds had in effect become private schools charging tuition.

I have carried this matter to both the Secretary of the Navy and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Each disclaimed either responsibility or statutory authority to act in the matter. The Navy said it was awaiting the outcome of impending court orders which it hoped would reopen the schools, while the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare insisted that Public Law 874 did not permit the establishment of off-base schools with Federal funds.

Mr. Speaker, I submit the Navy's position is, for all practical purposes, hopeless. The courts have announced their decisions and with the ink not yet dry, the Governor of Virginia is on his feet saying, "be not dismayed by the recent judicial deliverances, I will not yield to that which I know to be wrong."

It is abundantly clear then that there is little likelihood that the public schools will reopen in time for the second school semester, scheduled to begin on February 2.

As for the position of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the measure which I am introducing today would remove any barrier which may stand in the way of effective action on its part. This measure would, by amending Public Law 874, provide that the Commissioner of Education use funds at his disposal to secure the education of federally connected dependents in the affected areas by providing necessary schools and teachers.

I am informed that with the first half of the 1958–59 school year drawing to a close, the city of Norfolk not only proposes to keep the 10,000 children now without schools locked out, but is considering locking out some 7,000 more above the sixth grade. Rather than seek ways to solve the problem, the responsible leaders of Norfolk and of the State of Virginia seem to be determined to add to it.

Recently the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare issued a statement deploring the inadequacy of the substitute schooling which some of the locked-out children have been receiving. He expressed grave concern over the loss of what has already amounted to more than a million pupil-days and the serious implications of this loss.

In a nation which has been proud to lead the world in providing free public education for all, this is, to my mind, an unspeakable tragedy. And unless some direct and immediate action is taken to return these children to school, we will have inflicted a great injustice on our servicemen, their families, and indeed the American people.

Quite apart from the issue of integration and Virginia's defiance of the Supreme Court, I submit that our Nation's social, economic, and military security are directly involved in this willful obstruction of our children's intellectual and academic development. In enacting the Defense Education Act of 1958, which provided $900 million in Federal funds to improve this Nation's educational opportunities both at the secondary and college levels, the 85th Congress acknowledged the vital role of education in relation to our national security.

Indeed, the preamble of this significant enactment states:

> The Congress hereby finds and declares that the security of the Nation requires the fullest development of the mental resources of its young men and women. The present emergency demands that additional and more adequate educational opportunities be made available. The defense of this Nation depends upon the mastery of modern techniques developed from scientific principles and new knowledge. We must increase our efforts to identify and educate more of the talent of our Nation.

I am at a loss to comprehend, rationalize or in any way justify the absurdity of spending almost a billion dollars in Federal funds for education in the name of defense on the one hand, while we permit thousands of children to do without any form of education on the other.

The spectacle of closed schools, national discord, even ill-concealed rebellion—impairs our national security and does irreparable damage to our reputation abroad.

We cannot in good faith continue to close our eyes to a situation which so outrageously compromises our democratic concept of free public education—which defaults on our obligation to our servicemen and which jeopardizes our national existence.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed tragic that on the 41st anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine, we must talk about the most cruel suppression of that nation by the occupying Soviet forces instead of congratulating the brave Ukrainian people for what certainly would have been a splendid page in their century-old history.

What is more tragic is that this anniversary of the Ukraine's independence follows so closely the visit of Anastas I. Mikoyan, the hangman of the Ukraine, the traitor of his own nation, Armenia, and the executioner of the Hungarians.

I am certain that our recent uninvited guest has failed in his obvious attempt to lull Americans into a sense of false security, and that he has even more dismally failed in his attempt to divide us, so as to conquer us easier.

There was hardly anything more revealing about Mikoyan than the image of himself displayed on our television screens last Sunday when he faced the indomitable panel of the "Meet the Press" show. I wish on this occasion to extend my whole-hearted congratulations to Mr. Lawrence Spivak and Mr. Harry Schwarz for a job extremely well done. With restraint and with masterly knowledge of Soviet affairs, as well as Mikoyan's personal background, they have helped to display before millions of average Americans—less gullible, of course, than some of our industrial leaders—the image of a liar and a conniver who when pushed to the wall, simply tries harder to lie more.

Personally, I believe that Mikoyan's trip to the United States has excellently served not his but our purpose. The self-styled missionary of goodwill and the herald of peace has, by his own words, been stripped of all the paraphernalia of benevolence he so carefully displayed when tweaking little children's noses or when clowning with the clowns in Hollywood and Cleveland.

There are only two words that come to my mind when I think about Mikoyan's departure: good riddance. And, let us quickly return to our job of strengthening America's external and internal defenses against all that Mikoyan represents.

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, today on the 41st anniversary of their independence we pay tribute to the 40 million people of Ukraine and Ukrainian sons who have come to our shores, and have made such worthy contributions culturally and otherwise to our country.

The independence and freedom of the Ukrainian National Republic was of short duration, but its commemoration remains steadfast. Russian Communist tyranny permits no outward display of celebration in the Ukraine on this day, but in the hearts of Ukrainians this anniversary is deeply cherished.

The American people cherish freedom and are saddened by the oppression of the Ukrainians in their homeland. But we know that their love of liberty has become so deeply rooted over the centuries that it will continue to burn despite oppression.

Friends in America prayerfully hope for that day when once again there will be a free and independent Ukrainian National Republic.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, 41 years ago peoples subjected to Russian autocracy joyfully cast aside the heavy yoke of that oppressive regime and proclaimed their independence. To tens of millions the Russian Revolution of 1917 seemed to usher in a new day; they all sought and hoped to find their freedom in the overthrow of the czarist regime. At first their most sanguine expectations seemed justified; by the end of the First World War nearly all ethnic groups in that sprawling continental empire had attained or proclaimed their national independence. The Ukrainians were the most numerous and also perhaps the most important of these nationality groups.

Since midseventeenth century the Ukraine had been part of the Russian Empire, and during all that time the Russians had tried to eradicate Ukrainian nationalism and national ideals, but their attempts were unsuccessful. Liberty loving and stout hearted, the Ukrainians firmly clung to their traditional national ideals, and in 1918 they regained their independence. On January 22 of that year they proclaimed the Ukrainian Republic, set up their own democratic form of government and began to rebuild their war-ravaged country. Unfortunately, however, the independent state thus created did not last long; for only 2 years the Ukrainians enjoyed their richly deserved freedom, then they lost it to their inveterate foe, the Russian Communists. Early in the 1920's the country was overrun; the Ukrainians could not by themselves stave off the overwhelmingly superior force of the enemy. Their independent existence came to an end, and their country was annexed to the Soviet Union. From that day on more than 40 million Ukrainians have been captives under the unrelenting rule of the Kremlin.

On this 41st anniversary of their Independence Day, it is fitting that we should recall their independence. It is also fitting to consider the opportunities open to Ukrainians in America for demonstrating to their fellow Americans and to those abroad the qualities of energy and devotion that are such notable characteristics of Ukrainians everywhere.

Whether in their studies at school or university, at the workbench or plow, in business or the professions, Ukrainians have opportunities to participate in American life and to contribute their bit to the national well-being of this country and through its energy and creative power, to the wide world around us.

Mr. Speaker, on this memorable day in the lives of these fine and brave people, I salute them.

PUBLIC WELFARE

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, it is a fundamental American belief that people must have a voice in those policies and programs that affect their welfare. This is implicit in our form of government, and in every type of voluntary association.

With the growth of government and bureaucracy, however, there is the tendency of administrators to establish their own policies and to adopt a patronizing attitude toward the public. This has become noticeable in the administration of welfare programs for the blind. Where the professional workers often oppose the right of the blind to organize, and to be consulted on policies and programs affecting their lives and livelihood.

This has come to light through the protest by the 40,000 members of the National Federation of the Blind that they are being treated as second-class citizens.

It is indefensible that a few State agencies, and a minority of social workers consider the blind as incompetent wards, and oppose their right to organize in their own interest. The custodial attitude of these professionals regards the dependent status of the blind in our society as permanent.

The workers in the sheltered shops and the operators of vending stands among those who receive aid and assistance from blind agencies, are particularly vulnerable to agency pressure. They are never consulted as to their opinions.

Through the right to select and dismiss workers and operators, through the exploitation of various elements in the control system of operating the stands and through work assignments and wage determination in the shops, extreme pressure can be exerted on these vulnerable individuals. For the blind who labor in the workshops are not only unorganized but wholly deprived of the most elementary safeguards and privileges of organized labor.

There are no systematic and free relations with management, no dignity, no status, no integrity, no independence. Only shelter, the precarious shelter of patronage and paternalism.

The agencies and the administrators are the arbitrary bosses who oppose organization and self-expression.

It is to correct these undemocratic policies and procedures that I have introduced a bill, H.R. 187, to protect the right of the blind to self-expression through organizations of the blind.

It requires the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, to consult and advise with authorized representatives of organizations of the blind in the formulation, administration and execution of programs for the aid and rehabilitation of the blind. It forbids agencies administering blind programs supported by Federal funds to exert official influence against the right of the blind to join organizations of the blind and requires the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, to enforce this prohibition.

The blind are entitled to the full rights of citizenship. They are not the voiceless wards of the professional caseworkers, and administrators.

They only ask for a law that will give them the opportunity to speak for themselves, free from agency pressure or reprisal.

UKRAINIAN NATIONAL REPUBLIC

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, today, January 22, millions of Ukrainians including exiles in many lands will observe the 41st anniversary of the Ukrainian National Republic, a nation established in the last days of World War I only to be conquered and absorbed a few years later by the Communist rulers of the Soviet Union.

I have faith that the Ukraine and, indeed, all of the captive nations of Europe and Asia will once again be free. If history has proved anything, it is that no despot, however cruel, can extinguish the yearning for liberty that dwells in the hearts of men.

As a symbol of that hope, I have submitted House Concurrent Resolution 32 calling upon the American people to give recognition to the independence days of all the captive nations of Europe and Asia. In this way we can let the world know our spiritual union with those who aspire to freedom and national independence.

The Ukrainian independence day is the first on the calendar. I hope that all of us here, and citizens throughout the Nation as well as in my own district, will join our loyal neighbors of Ukrainian descent in this observance.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to call the attention of the House to the fact that today, January 22, 1959, commemorates the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. I believe that it is valuable to remind the American people and indeed the entire world of the fact that millions of Ukrainians and other captive peoples behind the Iron Curtain are still ardently desirous of freedom and the right of self-determination.

The recent visit of Soviet Deputy Premier Mikoyan to this country and, to me, the rather disgusting adulation in some circles in connection with his visit, are apparent evidence that the true facts regarding Soviet communism and its leaders must be brought home again and again to the American people. The antics of Mr. Mikoyan during his American visit, as well as many tempting offers of trade which he may have extended to either our Government or to private individuals, should not permit us to forget the crimes and violations of all standards of human decency. He is personally responsible for many of these. During the great famine of the 1930's, he shipped Soviet grain abroad while millions of Ukrainian peasants starved and he personally engineered the treachery of the betrayal of the Hungarian revolutionary movement in 1956. I further understand that only 2 short months ago, he delivered a violently anti-American speech in Moscow and yet today there seem to be those who overlook this record of betrayals and broken promises and accept him and the false impressions that he endeavored to leave behind during his visit.

I hope it will be of some small comfort to those millions of captive Europeans to know that remarks uttered in Congress today, and on similar occasions, prove they still have many friends in the Government of the United States. It is my pleasure to salute the Ukrainian people on the occasion of this 41st anniversary of their independence and once again express the fervent hope that they and their fellow captives may soon again enjoy the God-given right of independence with justice which should be the national heritage of all mankind everywhere.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest resources of our people is our deep love of freedom. Our devotion to the cause of liberty serves as a bond between us and other freedom-loving men throughout the world. Peoples who have been deprived of their independence by tyrannical oppressors look to our country to maintain and strengthen the cause of freedom everywhere so that they might one day again enjoy the blessings and joys of real liberty.

Such a people are the Ukrainians who observe on January 22 the 41st anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine. On that day in 1918 the people of the Ukraine formed a free and independent republic. They had played an important role in the overthrow of the czarist dictatorship and desired to enjoy their new liberty. But before long the ruthless Russian Communist army trampled the new republic and brought it under the tyranny of Moscow.

But the Communists did not then and have not to this day succeeded in extinguishing the flame of freedom and liberty among the Ukrainians. Today the spirit of freedom remains alive in the hearts of 40 million Ukrainians. Many have come to this country in the intervening years and have made great contributions to the vigor and spirit of our Nation. Those who remained in their homeland also remain as positive foes of the tyranny and slavery of communism.

We here must remain true to the cause for which these people continue to fight. We, too, must strive just as vigorously in support of freedom everywhere so that all freedom-loving peoples may continue to hope that they, too, will come to enjoy the freedom and liberty which we know here.

AMENDMENT TO CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced a bill to enact those provisions of part III of the 1957 Civil Rights Act which were stricken from it in passage by the 85th Congress. The bill is substantially identical to a bill recently introduced in the Senate by Senators JAVITS, CASE, KEATING, and SCOTT. The provisions of this bill are conspicuously absent from the bill introduced in the Senate last Monday by the majority leader, Senator JOHNSON.

In 1955 and 1956, during my tenure as Executive Assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, I assisted the administration in its study and drafting of legislation on this all-important subject. The 1957 Civil Rights Act, as finally enacted, empowered the Attorney General of the United States to initiate civil injunctive proceedings in any case involving an unconstitutional denial of the right to vote. This was a big step forward. Part III of the bill was equally important but failed of passage. The purpose of this legislation is to give the Attorney General the same civil powers that he now has in voting cases in any area where there is a denial of equal protection of the law, by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin.

The rights sought to be protected by this legislation are rights which are now protected by the Constitution. When they are violated the Government may now act under existing criminal law. This legislation would permit the Federal Government to take civil remedial action instead of having to depend solely upon criminal procedures after the event. It is designed to give the Federal Government the means intelligently to meet our responsibilities and to preserve the constitutional rights of all our people in every walk of life. I earnestly hope that the principle embodied in this legislation will receive the administration's full backing.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF THE REPUBLIC OF THE UKRAINE

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, in commemorating the 41st anniversary of the Republic of the Ukraine, we once again pay tribute to the heroic Ukrainian people whose will for national liberty and human dignity is indeed a source of inspiration to all freemen.

The history of the Ukrainian people, as we know, reflects the centuries-long struggle of man to attain individual freedom. Three hundred years ago, the Ukraine was an independent state, rich in its culture and thriving in its commerce. Today, despite its political enslavement, it is the second largest of the Soviet Republics and the richest in agriculture. Through the intervening years, the Ukrainian people have become familiar with the workings of Russian tyranny and oppression, under which they have suffered greatly. We are sure, however, that their spirit of freedom has not dimmed—that the flame of liberty still burns brightly in their hearts. Despite the continued oppression, despite the efforts of the Soviet masters to eradicate their language and individual culture, these people continue to resist and fight to preserve their national identity.

This yearning for freedom must be kept alive in our hearts as well as theirs. We can never forget that the infringement of personal liberty in any part of this world constitutes a threat to freemen everywhere. On this day, when we reverently celebrate with Ukrainians the 41st anniversary of the founding of the last Republic, we should reconsecrate ourselves to the spirit in which that Republic—and our own—was born.

My own rich experience with Americans of Ukrainian heritage and culture has produced in me both admiration and affection. I would pay tribute, therefore, not only to those Ukrainians still yearning for freedom behind the Iron Curtain but to all Ukrainians whose spirit of independence, industry, and love of freedom have added to the strength of our own moral fiber and to the richness of our national pattern.

We look forward confidently with them to the day when not only the Ukrainians presently enslaved shall be free but when all men may live together under governments of their own choosing and in freedom, human dignity, and peace.

BATTLE OF THE BUDGET

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, we hear much talk these days about the possibility of a balanced budget for the 1960 fiscal year, and it is not necessary for me to reiterate where I stand in the battle of the budget.

Various suggestions have been offered to provide the needed increase in revenue to attain the goal of a balanced budget. For example, it has been suggested that postal rates be raised again.

Before this proposal is given serious consideration, I would suggest that we take a hard, cold look at the present 27½ percent depletion allowance for oil and gas. I have today introduced a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for the purpose of reducing the allowance to 15 percent, and I take this time to briefly explain my reasons for advocating enactment of such legislation.

Let me make it clear at the outset that I am not opposed to a reasonable depletion allowance, but I am convinced that an allowance of 27½ percent is entirely too high. As the late Senator Taft said in 1942:

> It is to a large extent a special tax privilege beyond what anyone else can get.

A study of the history of depletion allowance for oil and gas shows that it was first proposed in World War I as an incentive for new oil explorations in the United States. The rate of depletion was first set at 5 percent, then 12½ percent, then 25 percent, and finally, in 1926, at 27½ percent. So, it readily can be seen that there is nothing sacred about a figure of 27½ percent, despite the emotional pleas of those who are opposed to even a slight reduction in the percentage.

As originally enacted, the depletion allowance was to equal only the capital originally invested by a company or individual in a particular exploration venture. Once the invested capital was recovered, no further allowance was made.

Since 1926, however, tax laws have permitted a company or individual to deduct 27½ percent from gross income for all properties producing oil or gas. Producers may claim the deduction year after year without regard to original investment costs.

There may have been some logic to such a high percentage in 1926, when the corporate tax rate was 14 percent. However, as the corporate tax rate was increased—and it stands at 52 percent today—the advantage to oil producers enjoying a 27½ percent depletion allowance has increased in proportion.

Bear in mind that this special 27½ percent depletion allowance is over and above all normal allowances and exemptions, since an oil producer also is entitled to write off all drilling and production costs. Simply stated, with this high rate of depletion, the oil and gas industry is not paying its proportionate part of the operating cost of government and is the most highly subsidized segment of American industry.

Talk about subsidies to farmers. If we were to agree with representatives of big oil companies that this allowance is necessary, why not a 27½ percent allowance for depletion the farmer suffers through loss of fertility and soil erosion on his farm?

Mr. Speaker, the facts bear out my conviction that the oil and gas industry is not carrying its fair share of the tax load. A report by the Department of Commerce showed that the effective tax rate in 1954 for 26 large domestic petroleum companies averaged 22.6 percent of net income, while for all corporations, the rate was more than double—or 48.1 percent.

Now, if we were to concede that a 27½ percent allowance is necessary as an incentive for oil and gas exploration in the United States—and certainly I do not agree—why is the same percentage permitted in connection with the overseas operations of great oil combines? Some of these combines wind up paying little or no taxes to the U.S. Treasury as a result of the combination of a 27½ percent depletion allowance and credits on taxes paid to foreign countries.

In 1955, the Arabian-American Oil Co., with operations in Saudi Arabia, received a depletion allowance of more than $121 million, and paid not a dime in Federal income taxes. Neither did this firm pay any Federal income taxes in 1956, when it received a depletion allowance of $150 million.

Mr. Speaker, we hear some mighty far-fetched arguments advanced by proponents of this 27½ percent allowance. One of the most fantastic is that if the allowance were cut, it would encourage the expansion of communism throughout the world. The best answer to this argument is that the greatest expansion of communism has occurred during the period since the 27½ percent rate was established.

Another argument is that widespread depression would result from any reduction in the percentage, even though we witnessed the worst depression in our history in the 1930's, and the 27½ percent rate was in effect at that time.

It has been estimated that at least $300 million in additional revenue would be realized by a reduction in the depletion allowance for oil and gas from 27½ percent to 15 percent. Three hundred million dollars is a substantial amount, and enactment of legislation such as I have proposed could make an important contribution in attaining the goal of a balanced budget. Moreover, a glaring loophole in our tax laws would thus be at least partially closed; a loophole which has permitted oil and gas companies to escape paying their proportionate share of the cost of government.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH THE MANAGEMENT OF OUR FISCAL AFFAIRS?

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, there is no better or stronger currency in the world than that of the United States.

There is no obligation more likely to be honored in full or more promptly than that of the United States.

Last week the U.S. Treasury offered a new series of bonds for sale bearing 4 percent interest. Were they sold at a premium? No. Were they sold at par? No.

They were offered and oversubscribed at 99.

The subscription required payment on January 20, 1959.

On January 19, 1959, the closing bid was 98⅜.

It is high time the Congress learned the whys and wherefores about our fiscal management.

UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America for its service in helping to keep alive the spirit of freedom among its people.

On this 41st anniversary of the Ukrainian independent state, it is encouraging to know that the drive for liberty and self-determination continues among these people, most of whom have been subjugated by the Communist conspiracy.

The struggle of men for freedom of opportunity and development through the years of recorded history always has been inspiring. The Ukrainians are carrying on a great tradition and have our support.

Our Nation today is expending terrific sums for the maintenance of a free world. We are resolved to defend and protect all free people from any encroachment by those despotic forces which would destroy the very souls of men.

But the task of the free nations will not be complete until all peoples who are capable of handling their own affairs realize the goal of an independent national existence. This principle is consistent, also, with the Charter of the United Nations.

BOSTON DISCOVERS CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the life and the achievements of Christopher Columbus mean much to the people of Massachusetts, and particularly to the large number of its citizens who are proud of their Italian and Irish ancestry.

During all of its history, the city of Boston for one reason or another, kept postponing the day when it would erect a suitable public statue in a prominent location to honor the memory of the great navigator.

The city of Chelsea, close by, is the only Massachusetts community with a public statue of America's discoverer. There is also a large bronze likeness, financed by private subscriptions, that stands on the plaza in front of St. Anthony's Church in Revere.

The official neglect of Columbus has aroused the citizenry.

Bills have been introduced by Boston representatives to the State legislature that call for a statue of Columbus, a replica of the Santa Maria, and the establishment of October 12 as a full legal holiday.

Under unanimous consent, I bring to you this long-delayed discovery of 1958, that was brought to the attention of Massachusetts, by the following account that appeared in the Boston Sunday Globe of October 12, last year:

NO OFFICIAL STATUE HERE (YET)—HUB IGNORES COLUMBUS—BUT NOT FOR LONG

(By P. A. Santosuosso)

Boston, the second largest Catholic archdiocese in the United States, is said to be the only major city in our country without an official statue of Christopher Columbus.

A statue of America's discoverer was offered to Boston more than 60 years ago—and it was rejected.

Shortly before the turn of the century a 9-foot likeness was erected through subscriptions from local citizens of Italian and Irish ancestry after they had been assured that the statue would have a place in the Public Garden. But the then Art Commission refused to accept the gift on the alleged ground that it lacked art.

Despite strong protests from the clergy and laity, the commission was adamant. Archbishop Williams, thereupon had the statue placed in front of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross on Washington Street.

In the early 1920's a report reached the North End, then the largest Italian community in Massachusetts, that Cardinal O'Connell was planning to move the statue from the cathedral grounds to St. Anthony's (Italian) Church of Revere Street, Revere.

North End citizens, hoping to establish a home for the memorial either at the North End Park or in historic North Square within the shadow of Paul Revere's house, formed a committee to call upon the cardinal.

But it did not occur to any member of the delegation to learn whether or not the cardinal's plan had been carried out. When the members visited His Eminence they were informed that the statue was already in Revere at its new home on the plaza fronting St. Anthony's Church.

Cast in bronze and standing on a 4-foot marble pedestal, the statue presents an imposing sight. It is seen by thousands of tourists and motorists proceeding along Revere Street to and from Revere Beach.

The glistening, bronze figure is the great pride of Msgr. Guido L. Pallotta, pastor of the church, who is an authority on art.

"It is inconceivable," Fr. Pallotta stated, "that the Art Commission of Boston condemned the statue on artistic grounds.

This is a real and beautiful work of art. I believe that the commission rejected the memorial for religious reasons, inasmuch as it depicts Columbus as a devout Catholic missionary."

While Boston lacks an official monument to the intrepid Italian navigator, there stands a marble statue of Columbus in Louisburg Square, Beacon Hill. Many are the legends about this memorial and the one of Aristides (the Just), the Greek statesman whose statue graces the opposite end of Louisburg Square.

According to Robert Shackelton in his "Book of Boston," a Greek merchant residing in Louisburg Square, which was private property, had both monuments sent over from Greece in December 1849. An account from Beacon Hill by Allen Chamberlain gives the Greek merchant's name as Joseph Iasigi. and states that the statues came from Florence, Italy.

But local Italo-Americans claim that Iasigi was born in Italy, that he served as consul here for his native country and that he was a wealthy importer. His statue of Columbus, they insist, was imported from Genoa and was the first to be erected in Louisburg Square. They add that a rival importer of Grecian birth, not to be outdone, followed with his statue of Aristides.

It is significant that both figures are made of the same marble and are of the same height, which is smaller than life size.

M. A. DeWolfe Howe, in an article in the Boston Globe some 15 years ago, wrote: "Meanwhile, Aristides and Columbus will continue as sentinels at the ends of the square, twin exemplars for residents and visitors alike, of the assurances of justice and discovery."

As far as this writer could learn, Chelsea, whose population is one-twentieth of Boston's, is the only Bay State city with a public statue of America's discoverer.

This life-size memorial was brought about through subscriptions from Italo-American organizations of that city, headed by Attorney Sebastian N. Tangusso, former member of the Chelsea school committee. The statue was dedicated in Chelsea Square on Columbus Day, 1935, with city and State dignitaries participating in what was up to then the biggest celebration in the history of that city. Seven years ago, due to traffic conditions, the statue was moved to a court in front of city hall.

Since the removal of the Columbus statue from the Holy Cross Cathedral to Revere, only one attempt had been made to have an official memorial erected in Boston. In February 1936, Joseph A. Tomasello, prominent contractor and civic leader, called a meeting of friends at the Parker House to discuss plans for a 15-foot statue. A few weeks afterward, Tomasello died and no one took over the project.

That Boston will, someday, join her sister cities in having a monument to the discoverer of America, is indicated in three bills recently filed by Representative Charles Iannello of Roxbury and Representative Charles W. Capraro of the north end.

As the result, Governor Furcolo appointed a recess commission to study proposals calling for a statue of Columbus, a replica of the Santa Maria and October 12 as a full legal holiday. The proposals will undoubtedly have the wholehearted support of leading Italo-Americans and the Knights of Columbus, who number more than 35,000 in the Boston archdiocese.

Approximately 50 statues or memorials, accepted by Boston, today beautify various sections of the city, as noted in an interesting booklet issued in 1946 by the State Street Trust Co. and edited by Allan Forbes and Ralph M. Eastman.

Among the statues officially recognized by the city of Boston is that of Leif Ericson, the Norse explorer whose arrival in America is still claimed by many to have antedated Columbus by nearly 500 years. The statue stands on the Commonwealth Avenue Mall, opposite the Hotel Somerset.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 hour today, following any special orders heretofore entered, in tribute to the independence of Ukrainia, and that all Members be permitted to extend their remarks at that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and to include part of the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, certainly it was a pleasure this morning to meet the gentleman from the Sixth District of Indiana [Mr. WAMPLER] who introduced himself from the well. He made some comment about the value of certain discussions to which he had listened, and he then referred to the rules of the House.

May I be so presumptuous as to call attention to the fact that there is a rule of the House, it will be found on page 523, section 985, of the House Rules of the 85th Congress, which provides that when a Member files on an office, he shall have preference over other Members who have had less service, who may file on the same office.

Among other things, that provision carries the following:

> Any Member or Member-elect of the House of Representatives may file with the Architect of the Capitol a request in writing that any individual office room be assigned to him whenever it shall become vacant. If only one such request has been made for any room which shall at any time have become vacant, the room shall be assigned as requested. If two or more requests are made for the same vacant room, preference shall be given to the Representative making the request who has been longest in continuous service as a Member and Member-elect of the House of Representatives. If two or more Representatives with equal length of continuous service, or two or more Representatives-elect make request for the same room, preference shall be given to the one first preferring his request. A Representative or Representative-elect making request for the assignment of a vacant room may withdraw the same at any time and no one shall have pending at the same time more than one such request. The assignment of a new room to a Representative, upon his request, or the appointment of any Representative having an individual office room as chairman of a committee having a committee room, shall act as a relinquishment by him of the room previously assigned to him.
> The assignment and reassignment of the rooms and other space in the House Office Buildings shall be subject to the control of the House of Representatives by rule, resolution, order, or otherwise. Nothing in this resolution shall be construed to affect or repeal the provisions of law heretofore enacted placing said House Office Buildings under the control of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the approval and direction of the commissions provided for respectively in the act of March 3, 1903, and the act of March 4, 1907.

Sometimes the rules are the rules and sometimes they are not.

On occasion I have filed on an office, and, notwithstanding the fact that I had some 3 or 4 terms' preference, I did not get the office. But that is all right with me. It may be I have a better office than the one on which I filed. But whoever decided against me did not know that.

THE LATE HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI].

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to advise the House of the death last evening of Hon. Thomas S. Gordon, of Chicago, Ill.

Tom Gordon represented the Eighth Congressional District of Illinois from 1942 until January 3, 1959. During the last two Congresses in which he served, he was chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House.

Tom Gordon was born in Chicago on December 17, 1893. After graduating from school he engaged in many activities. He was a banker, he was a newspaper publisher, and he began his political career as commissioner of the Chicago west parks in 1933. In 1939 he was elected city treasurer of the city of Chicago and left that office when he was elected in 1942 to the Congress of the United States.

Tom Gordon was my good friend. He was a gentle, considerate, friendly, hard-working person, helpful to all those who needed help. Anger, bitterness, dislikes were not a part of his makeup. He liked people and enjoyed participating in the activities which brought him in contact with persons in all walks of life. He was a charitable man and was interested in human progress.

We who knew Tom Gordon will miss him very much. To his dear wife and to the members of his family I wish to extend my profound sympathy in their hour of grief.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the distinguished Speaker.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Thomas S. Gordon we have lost an outstanding man. He knew his duty and he did it.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I, too, was stunned to learn of the death of Tom Gordon. We who have known him over the years were saddened by the severe illness which seized him during the last Congress and which curtailed him in the work he loved to do.

Tom Gordon was a fine Congressman. Working with him during the last 10 years was a privilege because of his knowledge of the House and of public affairs. But it was more than that, too.

It was delightful working with a person who was unostentatious, who was gentle, who was cooperative, who was friendly, but always seeking to be of help. He was generous with his time and with his talents. He was never too busy for anyone who might seek his assistance.

Tom Gordon loved his country—he loved working in the House, walking in the path of history and helping to shape the events of our time. He wanted peace above all, peace among the peoples of the earth and he did his best as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to create mutual trust and understanding between the nations of the free world.

I know of no one who ever had an unkind word for Tom Gordon. He was well liked by everyone. He enjoyed the highest respect and esteem in his home community in Chicago, as he did in the House of Representatives, as an able legislator, as a good father and as a good friend.

I want to join my colleagues from Illinois in extending my most profound sympathy to his dear wife and to all the members of his family.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn this morning of the passing of Mr. Gordon, who was my friend for many years, and for whom I had the highest admiration. I know of no one who has officiated in the Congress with more eagerness of spirit or with greater desire to serve his country well. We from Illinois shall miss him sorely.

It was my privilege to be a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs during the time that he served as chairman. His patience, his wisdom, and his impartiality contributed greatly to the welfare of his committee and certainly to the welfare of the country.

I should like to extend to his entire family my warm and understanding sympathy. It is wonderful to know that a man like Tom Gordon has served in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, my heart is heavy, and I speak in deep emotion. Tom Gordon was my friend, my very dear and warm friend, for many long years. Death's breaking of the bonds of human friendship give to those who remain among the living a shock that is eased only by our faith in immortality and by the memories that have been left with us in the years of association with a beloved friend who has departed on the great adventure. My memories of Tom Gordon will remain a strengthening part of my life as long as, in the will of God, I remain here.

I never knew Tom Gordon to do a petty deed or to speak ill of any person. His was the character that I like to think of as molded by the God of all of us. As much as any person I have ever known, Tom Gordon practiced self-abnegation, which is, as I conceive it, the essence of religion. When we forget ourselves, thinking only of our God, and of the brotherhood of man in which we are part, then only do we fully meet the challenge of the purpose of our creation.

Tom Gordon had tremendous ability, but he never paraded it. Tom Gordon made a tremendous contribution to the city of Chicago, and the Congress of the United States, and to the Nation, but he never wished credit or plaudits. It was the good itself that he did that interested him.

In his last term in the Congress he was faced with large responsibilities in a perilous time of international crises as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He was a desperately ill man; yet few knew of the pain he was suffering and the precarious condition of his health. He spared himself in nothing. He did every chore and met every demand with thoroughness, with unflagging industry, and unmindful of the toll upon his physical strength. This was the way Tom Gordon practiced his religion of self-abnegation.

He was a great chairman of a great committee. I am sure that every member of the committee will agree with that statement. He had many attributes of greatness, a greatness that impressed itself upon those who worked closest with him, but which, in his spirit of self-abnegation, he never paraded. I doubt if there were ever a chairman of any committee in any legislative body anywhere who enjoyed a higher reputation for being fair than did Tom Gordon as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He never did anything unfair. He never broke his word on anything. He stood steadfastly for his convictions, but never sought to force upon others their acceptance. He gave to persons with opposing convictions the same opportunity of advancing by argument and debate their convictions as he claimed for himself in the advocacy of that in which he believed.

I was happy in my good fortune to be associated with him in the city hall of Chicago. I was happy in my good fortune to be his colleague from Chicago in the Congress, and in the 85th Congress to serve under him as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I shall miss him sorely. I shall miss his smile and his cheer, as daily I would meet with him, but my many, many memories of Tom Gordon will abide with me, and these memories of a sweet man who was unselfish in everything will be a strength to me in the days and the years that may remain. To his fine wife and to his children go my deepest sympathy.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, it was with great sadness that we of the Illinois delegation learned of the passing of our former colleague, Thomas S. Gordon, of the 8th District of Illinois, who served with distinction in the 78th through the 85th Congress.

Many years before I came to Congress, the name of Tom Gordon was known to many as a man well respected in the State of Illinois, where he had served as commissioner of parks, of vehicle licenses and as city treasurer of Chicago. He possessed a great intellect and extraordinary quality. He was dedicated to the institutions of sound government. Tom was a man of honest and good character and integrity. He was a man of opinion, firm opinion, but tempered with great kindness. He was not known to waver or quibble, but sought what was right, and once having found it, was not to be swerved. Tom was a man of retentive mind. I expect he carried as much information in his mind about the problems of the people of his district as any man who ever passed through this body, and yet although concerned through his work as a member and later chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee with the problems of the peoples of other countries, he was a friend to the people of his district and left behind a record which will for years redound to their good.

Although Tom is gone, he has left for Celia, his beloved wife, his sons and his daughters, a legacy carved from a lifetime of contributions to his State and his Nation. The news of his passing will, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, be recorded in Guatemala, in Mexico, in Brazil, Uruguay, Poland, and other places too numerous to mention, where his accomplishments in study missions, and where his firm but gentle understanding was felt by all those with whom he came in contact. It was only because of his ill health after a lifetime of dedicated service to his country that he was forced to retire during his prime years.

Mr. Speaker, I ask, What greater contribution could a man have made to his people and his country, than Tom gave?

I am grateful for the privilege of joining with all of my colleagues of paying deserved tribute to this outstanding gentleman, patriot, and statesman of the great State of Illinois.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GARY. I would like to add my voice to the tributes to our former colleague. I think Tom Gordon was one of the most lovable men I have ever known. He was an able and efficient Congressman and he served his Nation, State, and district well. We all share the sorrow at his untimely passing.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. I also join my colleagues in paying respect to the memory of my dear friend and our colleague, a great American. Tom Gordon was one of those gentlemen who in his quiet, unobtrusive way was very effective in serving his country and his State. I think the people of his district and the people of our country have suffered a great loss in his death. I personally have lost a great friend. To his family I offer my condolences.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I, too, would like to join my colleagues in paying tribute to this great Member of the Congress of the United States. Tom Gordon was a son of immigrant parents who, through his conduct and his kindness, exemplified the very spirit of those great people who built this Nation. I join my colleagues in their sorrow, and extend my sympathy to the family of the late Tom Gordon.

Mr. Gordon was a member of a family which had left its indelible mark on the growth and progress of Chicago. An energetic man, Mr. Gordon's effort in helping particularly the immigrant settlers who found their way to Chicago is today legendary.

His conduct in Congress could well serve as a model for freshman Congressmen like myself, for Mr. Gordon had that unique attribute of always finding time to listen to all sides of a debate before making his decision. Mr. Gordon's membership on the Foreign Affairs Committee strengthened this very important group in its determination to stand up to those evil forces which would destroy us as a Nation. His wise counsel helped evolve the many facets of our foreign policy which helped strengthen us in the great ideological struggle against international communism.

His death leaves a void among those dedicated elder statesmen of America on whose shoulders today rests the grave task of securing our Nation from the evil designs of our enemies.

May he rest in peace.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, it was with keen regret and sorrow that I learned this morning of the untimely passing of my distinguished predecessor and dear personal friend, the Honorable Thomas S. Gordon.

Tom Gordon represented the Eighth District of Illinois for 16 years with outstanding ability and great legislative skill. All who knew him came to love him for the kindness of heart and gentle humility which characterized all his relations with his fellowmen.

Tom Gordon's many years of devoted and dedicated public service culminated in the distinguished service he rendered as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs during a critical period in international events. He strove conscientiously and well to fulfill the heavy responsibilities of the chairmanship despite the serious ailment which eventually led to his retirement from public service.

The passing of Tom Gordon leaves his host of friends with a deep sense of personal loss. I wish to extend my heartfelt condolences to his widow, Mrs. Celia Gordon, who helped him so ably, and who served loyally and efficiently as a member of his congressional staff. My sympathy also goes to his fine children and grandchildren of whom he was so justly proud.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. May I join the gentleman in this tribute to our late beloved colleague. He was able, sincere, and effective. He was so very human and so humble. He was one of the really fine Members of this House. I shall miss him. I join my colleagues in extending my sympathy to his loved ones.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, Tom Gordon came to the Congress in January 1943. We were sworn in together on that day. I knew Tom Gordon intimately during his service in the Congress. Tom was a conscientious worker. He represented not only the people of his district in the State of Illinois, but he represented the people of the Nation. He made a great record as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and served with ability as its chairman during the last few years. The day he left Washington last summer, I drove Tom down to the hotel where he was stopping the night before he left. He had sorrow in his heart when he was leaving. As we all know, Tom was ill for a year or more before he retired voluntarily from the Congress last summer and we hoped that a long rest would restore his health. I know every Member who was acquainted with Tom has a heavy heart because of his passing. I extend to his wife and family my sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to pay a tribute and express my deep appreciation of our former colleague. I served on the Committee on Foreign Affairs with him for several years. I was always very much struck with the fact that he seemed to do as our able colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts and majority floor leader [Mr. McCORMACK], once said, "Why do we not legislate our loves instead of our hates."

My distinguished colleague, Tom Gordon, legislated his loves and his likes rather than his hates. I do not think he hated people. He was possessed of a great kindliness. He saw people, perhaps, through rose-colored glasses. He was very generous in his appraisal of others. He was easy and pleasant to work with, and it seemed to me he accomplished a very great deal because of his fine philosophy of life. He was a great American and a very fine and able gentleman, a great citizen and a follower of God.

My deepest sympathy goes to his fine family and to his State of Illinois in their great loss.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound regret and sorrow that I learned of the passing of my good friend and close associate, Thomas W. Gordon. I first met Tom 25 years ago when he was in the banking business and also manager of the Polish Daily News in the city of Chicago. Later, in 1933, Tom became a member of the Chicago West Parks Commission, and he was a tireless worker in the interest of the people of the city of Chicago. In 1939 he was elected to the office of city treasurer, and in 1942 he was elected to the Congress of the United States from the Eighth Congressional District in Illinois. He served in that capacity until December 1958, upon his retirement.

I had known and worked with Tom all those years and I respected him most highly. He was a great friend and a great public servant.

I extend to his family and many friends my deepest sympathy in this their hour of bereavement.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I felt very sad and intensely so that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] who now has the floor, in his first remarks to the House of Representatives has to announce the death of his predecessor, our former colleague and our beloved friend, Tom Gordon. One could talk for hours about Tom Gordon; Tom Gordon the man; Tom Gordon the legislator; Tom Gordon the great American; Tom Gordon and what he symbolized in his journey through life. As previous speakers have said, Tom Gordon was one of the great legislators of the Congress. He did not evidence his devotion to duty by headlines, but by sincere and devoted thought and action. To me, Tom Gordon symbolized the deep things of life—the nice things of life—loyalty, love of one's neighbors and devotion to duty. He was a dedicated American.

Those of us who had the pleasure of knowing Tom Gordon are better persons because we had that honor and had that privilege. In his passing there has been taken from us one who made a profound impression upon us and one whose memory will always linger with us.

To Mrs. Gordon and her loved ones and to the people of the district he so ably represented for so many years, I extend my profound sympathy.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reluctantly and with the deepest sorrow, this morning I was informed of the sudden and untimely death of a former colleague and member of the Illinois delegation, Thomas S. Gordon.

All of us who knew him regarded him highly for his modesty, generous nature, and marked kindliness. His contribution to his Government in the field of foreign affairs will be a monument to him.

Congressman Gordon traveled widely and profited by his keen observations of people in foreign countries. His was the practice of learning more than could be learned at the conference table.

In Chicago, the city he loved and served so well, he will be sadly missed by those in every walk of life. His deep devotion to his family was one of his edifying characteristics, and, in their sadness, to them let us extend our most profound sympathy in their bereavement.

During the years ahead, we will call to mind frequently, for we shall not forget him, that charity dwelt in his heart, and that Tom Gordon was a warmhearted man, ever ready and willing to help his fellow man.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, all Members may have permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life and service of the Honorable Thomas S. Gordon.

There was no objection.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, the death of Thomas Sylvy Gordon, recently retired Congressman of the Eighth District, marks the passing of a distinguished American and popular legislator.

He was a kind and gentle person who loved human beings and served their needs as a devoted public servant.

His many friends will miss Tom Gordon—he was a true friend and a loyal follower of party regularity. He served his people well for 16 years—1943 to January 1959—until forced by ill health to retire.

Many of his colleagues realize that his laborious hours spent as chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee caused the undermining of his health and subsequent death.

The death of this great American patriot saddens us all and with prayers mourn his passing, and extend to his bereaved widow and family our heartfelt condolences.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to be closely associated with Tom Gordon during all the years of his service as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. During the 85th Congress he served as chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and I had the opportunity to share with my colleagues the benefits of his leadership and his counsel.

Tom Gordon had a long and distinguished career in the field of foreign affairs and his influence has been felt in many aspects of our foreign policy. His background and his interest gave him a special insight into the problems of the countries of Eastern Europe which have become the victims of Soviet aggression. His understanding of the peoples of these satellite nations and his vigorous efforts on their behalf were recognized by those responsible for the formulation of our foreign policy, and it was their custom to seek his counsel when they were confronted with particularly difficult issues. During the 83d Congress when I had the honor to serve as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I leaned heavily on Tom Gordon for support and advice.

Although all of us on the Foreign Affairs Committee benefited from his guidance, his support, and his knowledge of international relations, I am sure that every one of us thinks of him primarily as a warm personal friend. His modest and unobtrusive manner was in no way reserved. He enjoyed contacts with his colleagues, and in all of his contacts the warmth and friendliness of his spirit were clearly manifest.

It was a matter of great personal regret that failing health prevented Tom Gordon from carrying on with his customary vigor throughout the full term of his chairmanship, and it was a loss to the Nation that he found it necessary to retire from the Congress. I am sure that all the Members of the House had looked forward to continued friendly association with him during the years of his retirement. It was a great shock to me to learn of his passing. I want to join with all the others who have spoken here in expressing my sympathy to Mrs. Gordon and the members of the Gordon family.

Tom Gordon was a deeply religious man and a dedicated American patriot. His life did much to benefit his fellow men. Although we will be comforted by our memories of the contribution which he has made, his loss is very difficult for us to bear.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it grieves me no end to learn of the passing of our former colleague and very dear friend, Tom Gordon, of Illinois.

He was indeed a loving and a lovable character—honorable in all his dealings, earnest and sincere in his convictions, all based upon a deep sense of responsibility to his country and to his constituents, as befitting a good American. He was gentle, kindly, and understanding, respectful to all and respected by all.

He was a good chairman, a good Member, a good man. He will be missed by all.

I join our colleagues in extending to his family our heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was with great sadness that I learned of the sudden passing of our former friend and colleague, Thomas S. Gordon, of Illinois, who served with distinction in the 78th through the 85th Congress.

I was privileged to be associated with him as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. During the 85th Congress, Tom Gordon, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made notable contributions of which we are all very well aware. As a Member of this great body he has diligently served in the best interests of his constituency, the Nation, and the free world.

Tom Gordon was a man of amiable personal traits and no one who ever knew him could fail to be impressed by his quiet modesty and sincere humility. He was a man of the highest integrity who stood firmly by his convictions. His sincerity of purpose and friendliness of nature compelled deep respect and enduring affection. Tom Gordon's untimely death leaves a profound impression on us. We shall miss him. I join my colleagues in extending my sympathy to his loved ones.

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, although we knew that Tom Gordon retired from Congress because he was not in good health, none of us recognized how few were the days left to him on this earth. Certainly I was shocked when I learned of his passing.

Tom Gordon had a long and honorable record of public service. He held several important positions in his native city of Chicago. In those offices his devotion to duty and to the public welfare won for him a host of friends. Sixteen years ago his district first sent him to this House. Until he voluntarily retired he was returned in each election by large majorities.

Throughout his congressional career he served on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He brought to his committee assignment an unusual interest in and knowledge of conditions in Europe, particularly in the countries of Eastern Europe. He had a deep sense of indignation at the treatment accorded the people in those countries under Communist rule and over the years became an acknowledged spokesman for them. Several times he engaged in lengthy study missions for the committee. His reports of these trips to his colleagues and to his constituents showed an understanding of the problems we faced in the countries he visited.

Tom Gordon's long service appropriately culminated in his election as chairman of the committee in the 85th Congress. Until overtaken by illness in late 1957, he provided the committee with a dignified, impartial, and objective leadership. I will always regard it as a privilege to have served with him for so many years.

Tom Gordon had many wonderful human qualities. He was quiet, patient, and understanding. He was a man with deep religious convictions, whose very devotion to his religion gave him a compassionate understanding of human nature that I much admire.

To his family I extend my deepest sympathy upon the passing of a wonderful husband and father.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, through no fault of my own, I was unable to be on the floor last Thursday when several Members of this body paid tribute to the late Hon. Thomas S. Gordon, my friend and former colleague from our home State of Illinois. I would be remiss to my own deep sentiments if I did not take this moment to express my condolences and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks accordingly at this point in the RECORD.

From each friendship we cultivate in our many associations as Members of this Congress, we take something that we value as part of our own personal lives.

My colleagues paid fitting tribute to the late Thomas S. Gordon following his death last Thursday. What was said by those who knew him best is a fine and deserved memorial. I shall add only that in my 2 years' association with him, I enjoyed the friendship of one who was a real gentleman by any definition of the word. Our society would benefit with many more men of his character and general mannerisms. Our world would be better for more of Tom Gordon's kind of understanding and attitude toward his fellow man.

He will be sorely missed, though his family should find rich solace in the human and material contributions which he made to so many during his lifetime.

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. Mr. Speaker, I want to join the gentlemen from Illinois and my other colleagues who have paid tribute to our beloved former colleague, Thomas S. Gordon, of Illinois.

Our friend, Tom Gordon, was a man of great ability. He was sincere and forthright. His integrity was such that his word was his bond. We admired him for these sterling qualities, but more than that we loved Tom Gordon because of his great capacity and friendship.

Tom Gordon was a success. He was a success because he was a man of solid integrity. He was a success, because he was willing to give unselfishly of his fine talents to help make a better world.

His life was one of inspiration and encouragement, for it was in the fine American tradition. He was a poor boy who achieved much and gained honor for what he did, through hard work and a constant reaching out for more knowledge and a lifelong striving to find ways to serve those less favored than he was in abilities and personal assets.

During his recent illness my prayers for the restoration of his health and strength were with him, but God, in His infinite wisdom has ruled otherwise, and now I join with my colleagues in a fervent prayer for the restful repose of his beautiful soul.

Mrs. Kluczynski and I extend our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Gordon and the children in the loss of their loved one.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow that I learned about the untimely death of my dear friend and distinguished former colleague from Illinois, the late Hon. Thomas S. Gordon.

His sudden death, which came so swiftly upon his retirement from this body after the completion of the legislative work of the 85th Congress, brought a deep sense of loss to his family and to all of his friends in various walks of life.

I had the privilege of serving with Tom Gordon on the Committtee on Foreign Affairs since my first election to Congress in 1949. As a member, and later as chairman of that committee, he participated and presided over some of the most important deliberations that have come before us. His outstanding work in this and in other legislative fields has earned him a lasting place in the history of our Nation. He was a distinguished legislator, who always placed the interests of his district, and of our entire Nation, above all personal matters.

I respected Tom Gordon for his experience, his understanding of the issues, and for his integrity, and I had deep affection for him as a friend. His gentleness and consideration for his colleagues was one of his outstanding characteristics—and one that endeared him greatly to all of us who knew him, and who worked with him. He was patient and understanding in controversies, soft spoken in his counsel, and loyal to the principles which he held.

Certainly the district which he represented for so many years in this House had a faithful and devoted public servant. Even the failure of his health during his last years did not deter him from his unstinted service to his constituents. No request was too small, no interest was too obscure, to escape his undivided attention.

Such a man was Tom Gordon. And in his death, his State and our Nation have lost a trusted and outstanding public servant.

My wife, Blanche, joins me in extending our deepest sympathy to his widow, Cele, to his children and his grandchildren. May they derive some small measure of consolation from the knowledge that we share their grievous loss—and from the thought that our Lord has called Tom Gordon to be among his very own.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY POLICY

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of section 401(a), Public Law 414, 82d Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the Joint Committee on Immigration and Nationality Policy the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. CELLER, of New York; Mr. WALTER, of Pennsylvania; Mr. FEIGHAN, of Ohio; Mr. MCCULLOCH, of Ohio; and Mr. MOORE, of West Virginia.

COMMUNISM

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Speaker—

> Some critics are like chimney sweepers; they put out the fire below and frighten the swallows from their nests above; they scrape a long time in the chimney, cover themselves with soot, and bring nothing away but a bag of cinders, and then sing out from the top of the house, as if they had built it.

These words were written by Longfellow many years ago. I am certain that when he wrote them he did not have in mind the current insidious cancer of communism, which, conceived in violence, nurtured on the blood of countless thousands of innocent persons, rears its vicious form like the many-headed hydra in every corner of our land. Yet, Longfellow's words of so long ago could very easily be applied today.

I speak of the Communist Party, who like a silent army of termites, small and voracious, is as usual, the guiding hand of cold, calculated, distorted criticism. Criticism designed for one purpose; to destroy every vestige of protection afforded the security of America. Their present target? None other than the personage of J. Edgar Hoover who has been a veritable voice in the wilderness since the early 1920's seeking to awaken our Nation to the dangers of the Communist conspiracy, but only in the last few years have we heeded and cast aside the cloak of indifference.

Smarting under the sting of "Masters of Deceit," Director Hoover's factual exposé of the Communist Party, the Red tyrants and their dupes are now spewing hatred and cajolery in the hope that their chief target can be destroyed before this Nation will awaken to find one of its strongest bastions discredited.

The stone walls of the FBI's reputation, and that of Mr. Hoover, has thus far blunted every attack cleverly laid by the ever-probing, twisting lies of communism. The Communists in 1940 went all out in their treacherous designs on the FBI. This represented an all-out assault of chicanery and glib versatility. All of the party's big guns were trained to hurl the vilest tools of the smear technique. The Communists knew that to successfully prevent the FBI from pinning down their party line, one which had zigzagged, tacked, backed up, gone forward, and leapfrogged during the prewar years, that it would be necessary to destroy the FBI. The attack failed. It failed because the American people were not duped by the brand of hokum emblematic of Lenin and his unholy disciples. The sinister melody of carefully calculated deception could be detected in the strains. As today, the American public had complete faith and confidence in J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI.

We, of course, all understand that to accept the words of the Red masters of deceit and their bottomless bag of tricks is to swap away, little by little, our freedom. Seventeen countries have thus far found this to be true.

Today's well-organized conspiracy finds some strange bedfellows. The masters at artifice and subterfuge, the Communist Party, still heads up the big parade. The dupes in the line of march, although seemingly serious and intent in their purpose, are attempting to lull the public into a dreamworld of brotherhood with a baleful tune of protecting everyone from the Federal "Gestapo." In their germs of hate, they fail to objectively mention that the FBI is made up of young men and women from every corner of our Nation, graduates of some 625 colleges throughout the United States; that the Nation can never repay J. Edgar Hoover for his brilliant leadership in war and peace, and primarily, there are checks and balances which positively prevent the FBI from ever becoming the type of organization as claimed.

Who are these critics shouting from the housetops? They fall into a neat related pattern. The Communist Party in this country, as I mentioned previously, is the sparkplug. One of its latest blasts appeared in an official publication, the Worker, on December 16, 1958, entitled "Edgar Hoover's Four Decades of Fighting Against Peace."

The Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, as always, has mimicked the Communist line. This outfit is headed by Harvey O'Connor and Corliss Lamont. Congressional investigative committees long ago branded the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee and its leaders as foremost apologists for the Soviet Union. O'Connor has been identified as a member of the Communist Party.

A couple of other old familiar faces in the lineup sharpen into focus in the form of the Nation, a smalltime magazine edited by Carey McWilliams, whose record relating to Communist activities extends over many years, and Fred J. Cook, the vacillating writer who is well known as an apologist for Alger Hiss and William Walter Remington.

In activities of this nature, we would be indeed remiss to leave out of the lineup the identity of the Fund for the Republic. This tax-exempted organization, who long has espoused Communist causes, was the largest single advertiser in the smear issue of the Nation. It offered to place free copies of the Nation on the planes of large airlines, thus attempting to spread Communist propaganda throughout the country.

The Socialist Workers Party, long a master of the smear technique, in its December 8, 1958, issue of the Militant, a weekly official publication, carried out its assignment in the conspiracy by writing a series of scurrilous articles. The first one was entitled "J. Edgar Hoover, Chief of Thought Police." The second of the series of warped propaganda articles is now out. The Socialist Workers Party has long been identified as a revolutionary group which has as its purpose the immediate violent overthrow of our Government.

The next conspirator in the lineup, a member of the journalistic field, who under the veil of "objective reporting," is carrying out its part in an extensive manner. The National Commander of the American Legion pointed out in a strong statement defending Mr. Hoover and the FBI on October 28, 1958:

> We hope that the American press which, with a few tragic exceptions, is commendably patriotic, will continue to give J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI their necessary and persuasive editorial vote of confidence.

I am certain that all in Congress will agree with the hope of the Legion's leader, yet I must at this time fully identify one of those few traffic exceptions he speaks of. I have learned that the New York Post has assigned reporters in this country and foreign countries to dig up information for a so-called factual, comprehensive study of J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI. Naturally, in order to accomplish their true objective—that of smear by innuendo and distortion—considerable slanted questioning is being done. The editor of the New York Post is none other than the well-known self-admitted former member of the Young Communist League, James Wechsler. Mr. Wechsler formerly worked for the Nation magazine.

These are the critics shouting from the housetops. Their's are the voices of hate which they hope to nurture into an epidemic. It is hoped that the strong spotlight of public opinion, turned on by a grateful public, will fully expose these so-called "objective critics" in their true role—as, simply, messenger boys of the Kremlin. Now is the time for all of us to rally to the aid of a man, who thank God, has devoted his entire life to his country, and to an organization whose silent, efficient work allows us to sleep better at night—J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that the House may not be in session on Tuesday next. I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted me for Tuesday be transferred and take its proper place in the special orders on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON HOUSE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Accounts of the Committee on House Administration may sit during the session of the House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, Franklin Floete, Administrator of the General Services Administration, and the Aluminum Company of America have just entered into an agreement which marks a significant advance for the cause of small business.

Subcommittee No. 3 of the House Committee on Small Business, of which I am chairman, and of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIEHLMAN] are members, had occasion during the last two Congresses to follow closely the workings of the aluminum industry and in that connection, our subcommittee checked into the incentive contracts by the aluminum producers and the Federal Government.

Under such contracts, which furnished Government assistance to the producers to persuade them to expand their facilities, a certain portion of their production was set aside for so-called nonintegrated users. Alcoa originally agreed to make available an amount of aluminum equal to 25 percent of the annual capacity of the new facilities to such nonintegrated users. This contract was amended late in 1957 when the amount was increased to 35 percent.

During our hearings, however, it became clear that the term "nonintegrated" was not limited to small businesses. It applied to all companies other than those affiliated with the primary producers, this even though the intent at the inception of the contracts was to protect the rights of small businesses. However, such firms as General Motors and Ford were considered to qualify as "nonintegrated" users, so that it became necessary to try to obtain a provision which would protect the rights of small business within the meaning of nonintegrated users, because in times of tight supply small business concerns have difficulty in obtaining raw materials. Although this period happens to be one in which aluminum is in abundant supply, it is reasonably anticipated that even with the increased expansion of aluminum producing facilities, the supply of this basic raw material may again be in tight supply within the reasonably near future.

The agreement between GSA and Alcoa just signed guarantees 10 percent of the annual capacity of the contract production facilities amounting to 24,000 tons per year for small businesses, as that term is defined in the Small Business Act. The other 25 percent that is to be made available to nonintegrated users will, of course, be available to small business firms, too, but on a nonpreferential basis.

Mr. Floete and Alcoa are to be commended for their cooperation in carrying out the recommendation of the Small Business Committee. It is hoped that the other aluminum producers will also enter into similar arrangements.

ANASTAS MIKOYAN—MASTER OF DECEPTION

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, for the past 17 days the American people have been subjected to a barrage of stories regarding the visit of Anastas Mikoyan, the No. 2 boss in the Kremlin, to the United States.

In deference to the President of the United States and other responsible American officials, who were charged with the safety of this visitor while he remained in this country, the Members of Congress had preserved the dignity of this House by restraining themselves from commenting too freely on Mikoyan's visit. But lest our silence be interpreted as tacit approval of the chicanery which Mikoyan practiced during his tour through the United States I have asked permission to discuss Mikoyan's visit, and this the House has graciously granted.

In viewing his whirlwind trip through the United States in retrospect, perhaps it is just as well that we withheld our comment; for it was not until the last day of his stay here, when he finally reached the full realization that he had failed in his mission of deceit, that we saw the real Anastas Mikoyan emerge. We can now judge his visit more objectively.

The American press, radio, and particularly television afforded millions of Americans an opportunity to see firsthand how this master of deception parried questions put to him by newspapermen, who time and again merely attempted to establish the true motives of the Soviet Union in the cold war.

I had some serious misgivings about Mikoyan's trip to this country. He started out very strong, and it appeared that this Machiavellian monster was making a great impression on the American people. But as his hypocrisy began to show through, as he became increasingly aware that demonstrations which greeted him all along the route, protesting his visit, were not isolated acts of hostile refugees, but were, in fact, an expression reflecting the sentiments of a major segment of the American people, his composure began to diminish. It reached its lowest ebb on his final day here when, obviously irritated because he had failed in his mission to ease trade barriers and renew credit to the Soviet Union, he assailed the U.S. State Department for refusing to end the cold war.

Mikoyan's criticism of the American press, and in particular his verbal attack against members of the television panel who had so successfully exposed him for the faker that he really is, clearly indicated how unyielding is the mind of a Communist.

Perhaps the crushing blow to his deception was the stern warning from a great former President, Mr. Truman, who cautioned against "tourist diplomacy." Mikoyan was particularly bitter toward Mr. Truman because he realized that this great American, who had personally experienced considerable Soviet treachery, reminded the American people that the Kremlin mob has used the same bunk, which Mikoyan tried to peddle in America, for the past 14 years purely to feed its Soviet propaganda mills.

It must have been very clear to Mr. Mikoyan, when the time for his departure arrived, that he had not fooled all of us in America. I think that even those misguided industrialists, who for reasons best known to themselves wined and dined Mikoyan, today realize the sweet talk he dispensed at their elaborate luncheons and dinners was nothing more than a facade to soften American resistance against communism.

These American industrialists need only be reminded that Mikoyan wanted relaxation of trade barriers and renewal of substantial credits to Russia so that the Soviet Union may again compete with American industry for world markets. How long do these American industrialists think this Nation can survive economically with our high standard of living when the Communists build their industrial potential through the use of slave labor?

In his final interview, Mr. Mikoyan tried to create the impression that, based on the pleasant reception he received in many quarters, the people of America do not agree with their Government's decision not to be pushed around by the Soviet Union. There may be honest differences of opinion among many Americans as to the real value of Mikoyan's visit to this country, but I believe it would be a tragic mistake on the part of this Soviet charlatan to interpret the traditional good manners of most Americans as a sign that they do not agree with the policy makers both in this Congress and in the executive branch.

This man, who had engineered the blood bath in Hungary and miscalculated the dedication of the heroic Hungarians to the principles of freedom; this man, who continues naively to believe that the Communists ultimately can crush the traditional ties to liberty in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, and other satellite countries, would, indeed, be making a tragic mistake if he left this country thinking that we Americans are divided on the question of firm resistance to Communist intrigue or aggression.

As one Washington newspaper put it in a recent editorial, "Americans who saw Mr. Mikoyan's performance on television Sunday will know that no words will make any impression on him if he has so confused our traditional friendliness, curiosity, and courtesy for softheadedness."

But courtesy does not mean that Mikoyan's lies during his tour of the United States should go unanswered. It is within the framework of Mikoyan's deception that I sometimes find it difficult to understand how those who want a greater exchange of Soviet "tourist diplomats" believe we can find a solution to the cold war.

Let us examine some of Mikoyan's lies and attempt to set the record straight.

Benignly, Mikoyan told one American audience that the Soviet Union is suspicious of the United States because Russia is surrounded by American military bases. He added, obviously for dramatic effect, "Your guns are pointed at us."

The answer to this Soviet deception is simple—there were no United States nor NATO bases pointing at Russia before the Kremlin ordered the scuttling of all wartime agreements; before Russia tried to drag Turkey and Greece behind the Iron Curtain; before the Communist coup in Czechoslovakia; before the Red hordes raped our gallant wartime allies—Poland, Lithuania, Estonia, Latvia, Hungary, Rumania; before the Soviet division of Germany; before the Soviet-sponsored war in Korea. Those American bases can be liquidated overnight, and our $40 billion defense budget can become only a tragic dream anytime the Kremlin gangsters decide they want to conduct themselves in accordance with standards accepted by civilized nations.

Another Mikoyan statement: "Could we forget the past and start all over?"

The brazen audacity of this butcher of Hungary in making such a suggestion is actually overpowering. Does he want to forget the millions of innocent people now living in Communist slavery? Does he want to forget the 20,000 Hungarians massacred on his own orders during the Hungarian revolt? Back home we have an old saying: "Fool me once, shame on you; fool me twice, shame on me." Bringing it closer to home, here in Washington, those two monuments in front of the Archives building tell the story: One has the inscription, "What is past is prologue," and the other states "Study the past."

I regret that Mikoyan did not stop to ponder this message during one of his walks along Pennsylvania Avenue. Perhaps he would better understand why we insist that any new agreements with the Communists must be self-enforcible.

This Nation has demonstrated repeatedly we are ready to start toward a just end of the cold war any time the Russians are willing. But we will never submit to the principle that peace must be gained at any price.

Finally, there is one aspect of Mikoyan's visit to this country which I am particularly anxious to call to the attention of my colleagues regarding cultural exchanges, or, as in the case of Mikoyan, tourist diplomacy: This is the respective coverage that we in America, in keeping with the highest tradition of a free press, have given to Communist visitors in the United States and the coverage our American visitors have been getting in the Soviet press in Moscow.

A study which I hope to complete soon indicates that for the most part these so-called cultural exchanges are a one-way street. I should like to call your attention to how the Communist press treats our American visitors who go to Russia. We had had in recent months some very capable observers who went there in the hope of getting a firsthand view of the Soviet Union and to perhaps convey to the Russian people America's traditional dedication to peace. It might interest the Members of the House to know that only those statements which could be construed as friendly to the Soviet Union were reported in the tightly controlled Soviet press.

Mikoyan, in his television interview, said the reason Soviet newspapers do not give the same type of extensive coverage as does the American press is because their papers are much smaller. I submit, ladies and gentlemen, that this is brazen hypocrisy. Mikoyan, better than anyone else, knows the Kremlin would not dare to tell the Russian people the truth about America's peaceful aims. A study of Soviet newspapers regarding recent visits of outstanding Americans to the Soviet Union presents perhaps the best proof of how the Moscow rulers fear to tell the truth to their pepole. The Soviet press gave 25 words to Mr. Stevenson's visit with Gromyko, 125 words on Mr. Stevenson's visit to the U.S.S.R., 100 words about Mr. Stevenson's visit to Novosibirsk, and only 3 lines describing Senator HUMPHREY's 8-hour visit with Khrushchev. Not a word was mentioned about the Minnesota Senator's statement regarding America's sincere desire to end the cold war. I might add, Pravda has yet to print the article Senator HUMPHREY submitted regarding America's efforts to end the cold war.

Copies of Soviet papers that have arrived here indicate many of Mikoyan's statements in the United States admitting mistakes of Soviet leaders are being carefully screened from Russian readers, obviously to avoid destroying the myth of invincibility of Soviet leaders forced upon the Russian people.

The Soviet press has very carefully avoided reporting President Eisenhower's appeal that Mikoyan be treated courteously in this country. This omission obviously was designed to keep the Russian people from knowing that not all Americans greeted Mikoyan with enthusiasm.

It is obvious from studying the Soviet press that Russian newspapers report only those speeches made by Americans in Russia which are favorable to the Soviet Union, and whenever there is a particularly good story favorable to the Soviet Union, the papers do not hesitate to increase their issues to six pages, instead of the usual four.

Mikoyan's rejoinder that this blockout of true American expression is due to the lack of space is most unconvincing. In my 20 years as a journalist, I have frequently had to boil down a story to three or four paragraphs and still get the true and pertinent facts into that limited space. I submit that those who argue so convincingly for extending cultural relations with the Soviet Union give some serious thought to this problem. We can, at least, seriously question the real value of these exchanges when the millions of Russian people are being kept in the dark about what our American visitors are saying in Russia; and I think that perhaps until the Soviet Union is willing to agree to permit our American visitors access to the Soviet press, just as we in this country give Russian visitors full access to our press, there shall always remain a shadow of doubt about the wisdom of this entire program.

I submit, my friends, that Mikoyan's visit to this country was a failure, and it would not surprise me to see him drawn into the limbo of fallen Soviet leaders, simply because he could not beguile the great American people. Entertain them? Yes, that he did—but beguile them? I doubt it. At least, I feel reasonably certain that he did not fool the people of the 11th District in Illinois.

About the only conclusion that can be drawn from Mikoyan's visit to the United States is that the road to a lasting peace is still a very difficult one. At least by seeing this master deceiver firsthand the American people have had an opportunity to judge for themselves how utterly impossible it is to even try to do business with the Communists.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUCINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI] is rendering fine service in addressing the House on the subject on which he has spoken. Like the gentleman from Illinois, I, too, occupying a public position refrained from making comments while a certain individual was physically in the United States because of certain implications it might have on the internationl affairs of our Government. He is now out of the United States.

But, like many Americans, I was very much disturbed at the way this particular individual was received in certain quarters while in the United States.

As long as the Communists adhere to dialectic communism and their ultimate intent for world revolution and world domination, as long as the dominating influence of communism is its dialectic aspect, the dominating and controlling power or influence of international communism, they have got to keep on going, and going, and going until they either conquer the world or blow up. International communism as presently constituted cannot permanently survive where in any part of the world there are free men and women.

I was surprised that in some quarters this individual was invited where even a former President of the United States would not be invited by the same group, and I wondered if those groups realized that if the Communists took over America they would be among the first to be liquidated. I know I would be one of the first they would liquidate if they ever took America over—which they will not—because I was chairman of the committee which investigated communism in 1934 and for other reasons. I wonder if they realize the sinister intent of this man Mikoyan, and his type?

In getting the publicity he received, I wonder if those who received him recognized the fact that he is the prisoner of an ideology which compels him and others who are Communists in fact to continue with their vicious and evil intent and effort to dominate the world and subject all peoples to their domination?

In any event, he went around the country for some days and whatever effect he created he destroyed during the last 2 days of his visit. There were two men who penetrated his skin. One was former President Harry S. Truman and the other was Secretary John Foster Dulles. The article that President Truman wrote the other day got under his skin and the reception he received from John Foster Dulles also got under his skin. When he was on the "Meet the Press" program he exposed to the country, if the people analyzed his mind, just what was and is in his mind, and when he met with the members of the Press Club the following day he exploded. He declared war on Harry S. Truman, the State Department, John Foster Dulles, the administration, Adenauer, West Germany, and even West Berlin. He went right down the line declaring war here, there, and everywhere.

One of the points I think he and other Communists in the Kremlin have in their mind is the fact that because in America we have a Republican in the White House and the Democrats in control of Congress, it tends toward division. Well, they had better realize, they had better awaken to the fact, that we might have our differences of opinion in America as individuals along political lines, as Democrats and Republicans, but over and above that we are Americans and that there is no division on foreign policy and there is no division on national defense. There might be disagreements as to the amount of national defense or about this or that policy, but there is no disunity. If the leaders in the Kremlin think that because there is a Democratic Congress and a Republican in the White House they can capitalize that to their benefit, they had better wake up because they are seriously mistaken.

I wonder when this individual goes back to the Kremlin how Khrushchev and his associates are going to receive him having in mind that in America he was advocating revisionism, which is heresy so far as a Marxist is concerned. In America he was talking the opposite to what Khrushchev and others over there stand for in accordance with the Marxist ideology. I wonder if they realize he talked one thing over here and another thing over there? I wonder how they are going to receive this man who is guilty of the same thing in America that Bulganin, Malenkov, and the others are guilty of in the Soviet Union, and others who have been tried, found guilty, and shot. I wonder how they are going to greet him.

If he goes back with a misunderstanding of the spirit of the American people and the minds of the American people, he is not going to make any contribution toward world peace, because if he thinks in connection with the preservation of America and its future strength and its future progress there is any division among the American people or that there is any division among the Democrats and Republicans, he is sadly mistaken. For example, if he reports there is division over West Berlin or any thought of our abandoning the people of West Berlin, his report will be a false one.

I am glad the gentleman has, in his first speech in the House, not only considered the seriousness of this matter but he has had the courage to talk about it.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUCINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOSMER. I am glad that the gentleman brought this subject up today. I think one of the most overlooked incidents and effects of his trip has been that it has proved again to the American people and to the world the solidarity of the American labor movement and its leaders behind the American free enterprise system and in opposition to communism.

The tough-minded, skillful leaders of the American labor movement, long experienced in combating Communist infiltration into their unions, met this visitor from the Soviet Union with a full awareness and understanding of the Communist conspiracy and talked to him in the only language he understands and respects. They did not fawn; they did not quibble. They laid on the line their determination that the United States, its people and its workers will resist communism to the last man and with very firm policy. I think they sent that man back behind the Iron Curtain with full knowledge in his mind that from top to bottom every American is substantially united on the proposition of opposing Soviet imperialism wherever, whenever, and however it appears.

I believe that our labor leaders, as well as the actions of the American people as a whole, also sent him home knowing, and showed to the world, that the United States has neither an intention of abandoning the hope of the satellites of the Soviets to regain their freedom, nor an intention to abandon unity with our allies in dealing with the Soviet menace as a unit and not on a bilateral basis.

I think that Mr. Mikoyan also went back home to the Kremlin councils with a very sharply and upwardly revised opinion of the American economy to discuss. That was much needed since his original impressions were gained when he visited this country during the depression times of the 1930's.

Perhaps there were two chance remarks Mikoyan was overheard to make during his visit here that might indicate something of the frame of mind in which he has returned to Moscow. One of them was to the effect that unemployed people in the United States make more money than overtime workers in almost any other part of the world. The other remark was a rather facetious one, but I think it hits close to home. He is said to have quipped: "This is the only country that I have ever visited where the people can afford the luxury of throwing eggs at me instead of eating them."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUCINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Illinois, ROMAN PUCINSKI, a new Member, for the statement he is making in regard to the unsuccessful trip of Mikoyan to this country. And, I might say that the gentleman from Illinois now in the well of the House is well qualified to talk on Russia and on the methods used by the Soviet tyrants to enslave not only the countries immediately surrounding the Soviet borders but in their desire to enslave mankind, because our colleague is not inexperienced in congressional work.

Six years ago, when the Congress authorized the special committee to investigate the Katyn Forest massacre, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI] was appointed chief investigator and devoted over 2 years' service to the work of that committee. He did a magnificent service in investigating and presenting evidence for consideration before that committee, not only during our hearings in this country but when we held hearings in England, Germany, and Italy. As an investigator for the special congressional committee, he performed an excellent service in investigating and assimilating evidence at the hearings of the Katyn Forest massacre investigation. It was proven in this committee's findings that over 14,000 of the Polish intelligentsia—military leaders, doctors, lawyers, clergy—were massacred and buried in mass graves by the Soviets in order to destroy the flower of Poland's leaders and thus prevent these patriots from organizing resistance to Communist enslavement. The Katyn massacre was the first international crime in world history wherein one tyrant accused the other of its commission.

When the graves were discovered in the Katyn Forest, Stalin accused Hitler, and Hitler accused Stalin of guilt for the mass murders. Over 200 witnesses testified and hundreds of exhibits were recorded in the almost 2 years' work of our committee. Mikoyan, Stalin, and other Soviet leaders directed the mass murders at Katyn and also similar international crimes involving other satellite nations.

To my mind, nobody in the House is better qualified than our colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI] to talk on this subject. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take any more of the time that he has reserved today for his maiden speech, but I did want to pay a tribute to him for the great work he did as a special investigator for the Katyn Massacre Investigating Committee, on which I had the honor to serve as chairman.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUCINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue on the same theme as that of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN]. I was a member of the special committee of this House to investigate the Katyn massacre, and I conducted the hearings that were held in London at that time. That was the first time in history, I believe, of any of our sovereign nations that a special select committee of the legislative body of one nation was permitted to conduct formal hearings, with witnesses under oath, in a foreign country.

These hearings, I have been advised by our intelligence experts, were the first significant counteraction against Soviet propaganda in the Western World. The fact that we struck a raw nerve was evidenced by the almost maniac replies that they made through their propaganda media, attacking this committee and this Congress.

The gentleman from Illinois now speaking served at that time as the chief investigator of that committee and also served as my translator. I want you to know, Mr. Speaker, it would have been utterly and entirely impossible for this committee to achieve the great success it did had it not been for the extraordinary ability and the service of the gentleman from Illinois. I might also state that John J. Mitchell, the present chief counsel for the House Government Information Subcommittee, was chief counsel for the Katyn Forest Massacre Select Committee. As everyone knows, the legal problems of the Polish atrocity were unique in congressional investigations and his performance was outstanding.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUCINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in commending the gentleman for his remarks and to observe that there has just come to my desk from the Library of Congress the full text of a speech by Mr. Mikoyan in Moscow, last October. I am not sure whether the gentleman is making any reference to that speech or not. But I was very interested to know that in that speech Mr. Mikoyan, that smiling ambassador of good will, was berating the United States for seeking to promote wars all over the world. If it is in order at this point, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including some extracts from that Mikoyan speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRESTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the address by the Soviet Deputy Premier was delivered at the observance of the 41st anniversary of the October Socialist Revolution at the Sports Palace of the Lenin Central Stadium in Moscow.

According to the text supplied me by the Library of Congress, Mr. Mikoyan charged that "American militarists are still continuing to wave the torches of war off the Chinese coast."

The man who only a few weeks later was to come to the United States in the guise of friendliness added these words:

> American imperialism, which has taken upon itself the role of world gendarme, with its maniaclike pretensions to world domination which is creating hotbeds of war in one or the other corners of the world, has been unmasked again. However, it encounters the iron determination of the freedom-loving people to bar aggression and defend peace.

Mr. Mikoyan approvingly quoted a statement which he attributed to Cyrus Eaton—whom he subsequently visited in Cleveland—to the effect that—

> The only country where the people are all the time looking back over their shoulder to see who is eavesdropping upon them, is the United States. Even Congressmen who consider Dulles to be an absolute fool are afraid to speak of this. It is we who have created the position of a police state.

Referring to the situation in the Middle East and Far East Mr. Mikoyan said:

> The flames had hardly died down in the Middle East, when the Americans began to fan the flames in another hotbed of war, which they had created earlier as a result of the occupation of Taiwan.

Such were some of the typical expressions of what must be presumed to be Mr. Mikoyan's true feelings toward the United States.

THE PLIGHT OF THE ILLINOIS SMALL FARMER AS VIEWED FIRSTHAND BY CONGRESSMAN GEORGE E. SHIPLEY IN THE PAST YEAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHIPLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SHIPLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems that everyone is concerned about the present farm situation, but no one seems to be doing very much in correcting it. The farmers of southern Illinois, whose net income has continually slid downhill for the past many years, definitely are in dire need of a better farm program, and no one knows this so clearly as the small farmer himself.

When we have a school problem, we go to our greatest educators, our professors and our teachers to remedy the problem. When we are sick we go to the doctors and hospitals to be cured. I feel that the only way we can solve our farm program is to appeal not only to our farm organizations, but to the farmers as individuals. These people have many little problems which are unknown to so many of us, and there are many steps that need to be taken to correct our farm program.

The last few years Mr. Benson has so completely messed up the farm program and confused the issues until it is almost an impossibility to get it back on its feet where the little farmer may have a decent income.

In talking to these Illinois farmers, I find one thing they really believe would help solve our present Benson-bungled farm program. It is to move our food surplus, which we have on hand now, which is the largest amount of farm surplus we have had for many years, to the foreign countries, who are in great need of help and assistance, and let these farm products take the place of the millions and millions which has turned into billions of dollars we send overseas.

These farmers, as myself, are not isolationists or selfish. They want to share our wealth and the products we have here in the great United States with our neighbors, but they feel the way we should do this is through food and clothing instead of so-called cash, and in taking this step it would help the little farmer's income climb back up to where it should be. It would put money into their hands to where they could buy farm machinery, which they have needed, but did not have the necessary income to buy it. In doing this, it would put our factories back to work, unemployment would drop and our country as a whole would be more prosperous.

The most important part of working our surplus food into our foreign aid program would be that the common people in these foreign countries would receive the farm products and much more of such would trickle down to the little people than does the cash that we send to these countries.

In southern Illinois there are many small farmers, and I might say the number of small farmers is decreasing very rapidly each year. Through necessity they are either getting a job in town in addition to their farmwork, or, they have their wives get a job in town, so they may earn enough money to be able to stay on the farm. If they do not, or cannot get this additional employment and the profits are too low on the farm, they must abandon their farm and seek full-time employment to make a decent wage to send their children to school and to buy the very necessities of life.

In the past year, Mr. Benson has been attacked from all sides by all kinds of people to resign as Secretary of Agriculture and let a new man take over, but this is not what the farmers need. Mr. Benson can be replaced by tens of thousands of people, and if the same farm program is carried on, it will do no good to change the faces.

What the farmers want is a change of programs completely. Until this is done the farmers' profits will not increase to the place where they can earn a living on the farm without having part-time employment elsewhere.

Now is the time for a change, not next year or the year after, for if we wait that long there will not be any small farmers left in this great agricultural country. They will be plowed under, so to speak, and that is just exactly what our present farm program is doing, for it is a proven fact that more small farmers have been pushed off the farm under the present program than any other farm program in history.

Our country's prosperity and economy hubs on our so-called little farms, even though some folks do not believe this. It is true they are the basis of our wonderful country and should be treated as such. They take the biggest gamble of any business or profession in the country. When they plant their seeds in the ground that the good Lord has given us, they have no guarantee as to the amount of rain or sunshine they will receive. They are completely at the mercy of nature and of the farm program that we put forth. Let us help the little farmers before they are lost completely.

In speaking of small farmers, I mean the dirt farmer who farms 100 to 200 acres, from which he derives his sole income—the farmer who might have two or three cows, a few chickens, and who are on the farms their fathers and forefathers have had. They are working and plowing and planting the same ground their fathers and forefathers before them worked, plowed, and planted, working just as hard and just as long, yet receiving just a little in proportion more than their fathers received years ago. During this time, the prices of everything they need on the farm continued to rise and therefore they have been thrown into what you may call a recession and inflation at the same time.

HON. DAVID L. LAWRENCE, GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, January 20, 1959, a great American and dedicated public servant, David L. Lawrence, was inaugurated as Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Drawing upon the experience of years of public service, Governor Lawrence, in his inaugural address, urged that broad tax and economic issues confronting Pennsylvania be placed above the contentions of partisanship.

This approach is sorely needed on all levels of government. Governor Lawrence successfully demonstrated the value of this approach during his 12 years as mayor of Pittsburgh. His inspiring leadership brought together people of all walks of life and all degrees of political persuasion to work together to bring about the world-renowned Pittsburgh renaissance. A lifelong politician he brought new stature to the profession of politics by demonstrating his belief that good government is good politics.

As a Democratic national committeeman for Pennsylvania for 18 years, Governor Lawrence's support of the best in American politics has been of national importance.

Mr. Speaker, Governor Lawrence's inaugural address is an inspiring message for all the people of America. For that reason, I include the text of his address at this point in the RECORD:

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF GOV. DAVID L. LAWRENCE, DELIVERED JANUARY 20, 1959, AT HARRISBURG, PA.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, a beginning is always a time of festival. Primitive man, close as he was to nature, celebrated the coming of each season. We take good care to welcome each new year. There is in each of us a spirit which looks to the future with pleasure and with hope; we are sure that tomorrow will bring us the fulfillment of those dreams which have been denied us in the hard cold past.

So it is natural that we make a jubilee of our inaugurations.

The day abounds with genuine good wishes.

There is music and dancing—a true holiday mood.

The victorious party is happy in the tangible evidence of its triumph.

Those who lost—and we cannot all win in this contest of self-government—are philosophic.

The worst campaign forebodings on either side—all the overstatement, the occasional spite, the excesses of competition—vanish as completely as last year's snows.

We find that on inauguration day we are neither devils nor angels; neither villains nor demigods. We are simply men and women entrusted with great responsibilities, prayerful that their wisdom and their courage will prove equal to the great task which has come to them.

Being human, I must confess that I am not without emotion on this day which means so much to me, to my family, and to those good friends who have worked with me in government and politics through these many years.

I believe I know something of the Governorship of Pennsylvania. I have seen men struggle and contest for this prize of office; form factions within parties and wage bitter hate-filled war between the parties to obtain it; surrender their judgment to their ambition; become all but blind to any other goal.

I consider myself fortunate that I did not obtain the office on such terms. I became a candidate because it was thought that I could bring unity to my party; I was elected Governor because a majority of Pennsylvanians believed that I would, with such strength and experience as I possess, summon up the full energies of Pennsylvania to meet the problems which confront us.

As Governor, I will be free of all obligations except those of my oath and of my conscience.

I will be loyal to my party, yet I will never put party above the Commonwealth.

I will be grateful to my friends, yet I will never allow friendship to trespass against the State's best service.

I will be ambitious for Pennsylvania's future; the more so, because I have no political ambitions of my own.

It is a great honor to be Governor of Pennsylvania, but the honor becomes a lonely symbol—an empty matter of portraits and ceremony—if the Governor does not use his office for the effective leadership of the Commonwealth he heads.

As it may be given me, I will use every resource, every ounce of strength that lies in this great office, for the advancement of Pennsylvania and its people.

The Commonwealth is fortunate, this new administration is fortunate, that the Governor whom I succeed is a man of conviction, a man of ideals, a man of high purpose and high principle.

There will be no shock of transition from a Leader to a Lawrence administration.

Shading and emphasis may vary—because men's methods and approaches inevitably vary—but I take this office comforted by the knowledge that Governor Leader, in his 4 years of office, did so much to recognize the problems of this State and did so much to prepare the implements for their solution.

This last administration was not afraid to blaze new trails—in economic development, in human welfare, in education, throughout the vast reach of the State's responsibilities.

This new administration will have all the advantage of the hard pioneering that has gone before it.

We will have skilled administrators—good public officers trained in their work and sympathetic to our objectives.

We will have a basic framework of useful legislation, which now must be financed and applied to achieve its full effectiveness.

There will, of course, be new recommendations for legislation from the executive to the legislature, but as I now see them, they will be specialized rather than general, filling gaps and increasing our effectiveness, rather than opening broad new areas of public action.

And, as a basic and harsh fact in our public life, we must act to solve a very difficult fiscal problem.

We must, as soon as we can do so, find new revenues for the State so that we can meet our acknowledged responsibilities.

In this, we are not alone.

The Governor of New York and the Governor of Massachusetts are at grips with tax problems as difficult as ours. Ohio is searching for new income sources.

We all know the struggles of our school districts and our municipalities.

I read the other day, translated into modern English, the call for the first true Parliament to meet in England—the very first legislative session directly ancestral to our own Congress and our own general assembly.

The King who issued the call was Edward I.

The time was 1295—664 years ago.

The subject was the Kingdom's need for money.

And King Edward, addressing his Nobles and Commons, said to them of taxes: "What touches all, should be approved by all."

In retrospect, I believe that each of us would now admit that Pennsylvania would be better off today, our problems less acute, if we had followed the King's maxim when our pressures for new State revenues began to rise at the end of World War II.

But what is past cannot be undone.

I begin my term of service today in the firm belief that we can take our tax issues out of the contention of partianship—that indeed we must do so in the narrow balance that exists in our political structure.

I hope we can avoid a Democratic tax program or a Republican tax program; a governor's tax program, a house tax program, a senate tax program.

I hope we can achieve, hard as it is to do, a Pennsylvania tax program that will be fashioned on the basis of what touches all, should be approved by all.

To help us toward this goal, I have appointed a group of very able Pennsylvanians, evenly divided between the parties, broadly representative of management, labor, and public service, to give us the benefit of their advice on tax policy for Pennsylvania. Their report should be a guide which we can all find useful.

It is noteworthy, I think, that every person whom I asked to serve on the tax policy committee agreed at once to do so—although we all know that there is little glory and much abuse in store for those who recommend taxation, any kind of taxation.

That was another clue to me that we have reached a point in the public affairs of this State where we can have a much-needed era of political good feeling.

I think I know, as well as anyone, that Pennsylvania politics is traditionally rough and tough, fiercely competitive, materialistic, dog-eat-dog.

I know that each party will—humanly and properly—seek to win courthouses and city halls through Pennsylvania this year.

I know that next year, each of us will try his level best to carry Pennsylvania for the presidential nominee of his party.

I know it is healthy to have two strong parties, well-matched, and to have a lively hard-hitting opposition.

But I am sure there is a point where opposition becomes sterility, where name-calling becomes an end and an art in itself, where the best interests of the community—its vital needs—are heedlessly sacrificed for a fancied political advantage that isn't worth two pins in lasting political achievement.

I will do my utmost—I will go as far as anyone in this State—to create an atmosphere where a program for Pennsylvania can be judged and executed on its merits, without regard to which party gets the credit and without regard to political and sectional rivalries.

It would be an overstatement to say that Pennsylvania has a crisis to meet and overcome.

It would be the honest truth to say that Pennsylvania has a series of economic problems, many years in the making, that can bring us a grave crisis in the future if we do not learn to act together and to act now.

It would be blindness to deny that many trends in our Nation's economic life are not going in our favor. Pennsylvania farms, Pennsylvania mines, Pennsylvania railroads will never again support the massive labor force of the years gone by. Pennsylvania has been preeminently a State of heavy industry. We suffered sharply in the recession of 1958, far more than the Nation as a whole, and we are not yet out of the woods, in spite of the national production indexes.

We have had no great Federal development projects to change and bolster our economy.

Aviation and rocketry—the focus of defense spending—have little direct impact upon Pennsylvania's industries and employment.

The growth pattern of population in the country favors the South and West. We must not become a region where we export our most vigorous and ambitious men and women—as the Mountain, South and New England have been doing in this last generation.

We already have areas of chronic unemployment, and they are growing—not contracting.

Manufacturing has ceased to be the major source of employment in our society—and Pennsylvania is a manufacturing State. There has been a tremendous shift, nationally, to the service industries, in which we are not predominant.

All of this is the dark side, put to you today not because I am an alarmist but because I believe that we must know our weaknesses as well as boost our strengths.

Pennsylvania's vital problems are not political.

They are economic.

We must deal with the stubborn unemployment that besets us; we must act to assure our future as a prosperous, productive unit in the American economy, as fruitful and as well-rewarded as the best.

Our great danger—a fatal danger—is a policy of drift.

That is what this administration will not do.

We will have a policy of action—action not by government alone, but by industry, by finance, by labor, by community organization, so that the resources of Pennsylvania are mobilized before it is too late.

We have vast resources—in wealth, in skills, in enterprise, in organization. We have great metropolitan cities, great national and international business enterprises, great universities, an unsurpassed labor force, ports on the ocean and the inland waterways, unequalled internal transportation, an early start in atomic energy and manufacture.

And we have a great tradition of success.

As Governor of Pennsylvania, with all the strength God grants to me, I will ask of the people of this State their greatest—their maximum—effort. I will ask of the Federal Government its full support for our endeavors. I will ask of our local governments their full cooperation. I will ask of business and of labor, of community leadership everywhere, an unstinting participation in this work we must do for Pennsylvania.

I will promise them, as I promise you today, that the Commonwealth will meet every obligation placed upon it.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MONAGAN. I should like to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks concerning Governor Lawrence, because I feel that the plan to which the gentleman refers is one which leads the way for other cities not only in that section but in other sections of the country.

I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon me saying that in Connecticut we also have an outstanding exponent of urban renewal and rehabilitation in the person of Mayor Lee, of New Haven, who is a worthy coworker of Governor Lawrence in this vital field.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLOOD. I have just returned from Harrisburg, where I attended the inaugural ceremonies of the distinguished Governor of Pennsylvania. I can say that I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is from Pittsburgh, has been a close friend and adviser of the distinguished Governor for a number of years. I associate myself with him in his remarks about our mutual friend and distinguished American, David Lawrence.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include the inaugural address of Governor Lawrence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to reserve this hour in this session of the greatest legislative body in the world for the purpose of paying tribute and permitting my colleagues of the House on both sides of the aisle to join with me in this tribute to the history and the tradition and the love for independence and freedom of a great nation and a great people, the Ukraine.

Let me emphasize that the Ukrainian under no circumstances is Russian in the sense that we use the term loosely in this country. That is no aspersion upon the Russians, because the Russians are fine people. There are no bad people. People are not bad, people are not evil, but leaders and governments and political philosophies can be. So when we use the word "Russian" in the sense of aspersion we refer not to the great and the wonderful people of Russia, who have been historically and traditionally friends of this Nation, and of the American people—we refer, then, not to the Russian people, but to this evil thing which seems to have come from the bottom-most pits of Dante's seventh hell, this atheist-Communist philosophy which has for its goal the doom of the world.

The Ukraine is a people by itself. The Ukrainians have their own language; their own customs; their own traditions; their own history. It is through centuries of oppression that this great nation and this great people have suffered and have bled and have lost their liberty. There are few Members of this House who have not sprung from races and peoples of minorities. In my veins, Mr. Speaker, flows the proud blood of Irish ancestry. Need I say more? That being the case, we know hardship and oppression. I come today to take this time, Mr. Speaker, to place upon the RECORD of this great Congress of this Nation our tribute to these people and to this nation. In the United States of America today are dozens of thousands of the descendents of the Ukraine, and the American citizens of Ukrainian ancestry yield to American citizens of no ancestry in their loyalty and devotion to the United States of America. The casualty records of several of our wars prove in blood their right to stand shoulder to shoulder with all and any of us, and they proudly so do. A man can have two loves—he can love his wife and he can love his mother with equal feeling and depth. Two separate entities, but an equally great love. A man, especially in the United States, can love this great country of ours as he can and does and as we all do, but if he is an American he can and should have warmth in his heart, love and affection, and regard for the country—the motherland—the fatherland—from which his ancestry sprang. I use these words to certify those feelings for Americans of Ukrainian ancestry.

Historic Ukraine is the largest country in Eastern Europe and the Ukrainians constitute the most numerous of all ethnic groups in that region, more than 40 million in all. The country is famous for its fertility and for its natural wealth; it has long been regarded as the breadbasket of Eastern Europe and most of Russia. Its hardworking, sturdy, and stouthearted inhabitants, the solid core of the whole East European peasantry, have tilled their soil tirelessly and ceaselessly, both for their own well-being and also for that of their neighbors, and recently for their cruel taskmasters in the Kremlin. Ironically the fact that the steppe land of Ukraine is fertile and extraordinarily rich in natural resources seems to have been a prime cause of the misery and misfortune of the Ukrainians. Its wealth and its geographically strategic position have roused the envy and anger of its powerful neighbors, and have occasioned its conquest by alien tyrants.

For some 300 years the Ukraine has been submerged in the Russian Continent. During all that time autocratic czars and cruel Communists have done their worst to suppress and eradicate what we in the West regard as the best Ukrainian traits: their desire for freedom, their boundless love for their homeland, their undying yearning for political independence, and their constant readiness to sacrifice their all for the attainment of their national goal. Only once in the course of three centuries have they had the opportunity to attain that goal. That was in 1918. When the Czar's oppressive and stifling autocracy was overthrown by the Russian Revolution in 1917, and imperial Austria's rulers could no longer maintain their hegemony over western Ukraine, Ukrainian leaders seized upon the occasion and proclaimed their national independence. That was on January 22, 41 years ago, the day on which the Ukrainian Republic came into existence, and for the first time since mid-17th century, Ukrainians were free in their beloved homeland.

That memorable and historic day has become a landmark in modern Ukrainian history, and remains as the brightest spot in the struggle for their national independence and freedom. Since then it has been celebrated annually as a national holiday. Unfortunately, the republic created then did not last long. Surrounded by enemies and internally weak; also unable to secure the indispensable outside aid, its days seemed to have been numbered. Early in 1920 Communist Russians treacherously attacked it, overran it, and then it was incorporated into the Soviet Union. To this day it remains a province, a colony one might say, of the vast Soviet empire, and, of course, Ukrainians are fated to suffer under the unrelenting Soviet tyranny. The whole country is like a large prison, a slave-labor camp, completely sealed off from the world outside. All forms of freedom are denied to them, and they are not even permitted to celebrate their Independence Day. But the many hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians who live in the free world celebrate the anniversary of that day. Loyal and patriotic Americans of Ukrainian descent solemnly observe this memorable anniversary in their worthy effort to keep alive the spirit of an independent and free Ukraine. I am glad to join them in this solemn celebration, on the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks at this point and following mine insert in the RECORD the statement of Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, professor of Georgetown University and chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRESTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

VOICE OF AMERICA BLUNDERS ON THE NON-RUSSIAN NATIONS IN U.S.S.R.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, several months ago the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Foreign Operations instituted hearings on the recent cutbacks in Voice of America programs beamed to a number of major non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. Under the able chairmanship of the Honorable WAYNE HAYS, of Ohio, the committee heard testimonies submitted by USIA officials and by leaders of various national organizations in this country. It is expected that these important hearings will be resumed soon.

The vital importance of the enslaved non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. to our national security and to our position in the unending cold war is yet to be generally appreciated in this country. Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Ukraine, Turkestan, and several other captive nations in the U.S.S.R. are natural allies to the cause of freedom and to this country. Indeed, in the aftermath of Mikoyan's divide-and-conquer tactics, our concern should be concentrated on the aspirations and needs of these captive countries submerged behind the thin legal facade called the Soviet Union.

Instead of showing greater concern for these enslaved non-Russian peoples, the Voice of America has decided to eliminate or reduce our programs to them. This action is being taken despite USIA's own admission that our broadcasts to these peoples are being heavily jammed by imperialist Moscow. This in itself should give us cause for wonderment.

One of the testimonies heard by the Hays committee was that given by Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, who is the national chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America and also professor of economics at Georgetown University. Dr. Dobriansky's testimony treats of many essential aspects of this problem. For the benefit of our Members who are vitally interested in the conduct of our information services, I ask that this testimony be printed in the RECORD.

STATEMENT OF DR. LEV E. DOBRIANSKY, PROFESSOR OF GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY AND CHAIRMAN OF THE UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA, ON THE VOICE OF AMERICA, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON STATE DEPARTMENT ORGANIZATION AND FOREIGN OPERATIONS, HOUSE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS, MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1958

Mr. Chairman and members of this committee, I am most grateful for this opportunity to testify on some current changes undertaken by our United States Information Agency in its Voice of America broadcasts to the Soviet Union. At the very outset I wish to state that it is not my intention at all to indulge in wild accusations or indictments against the USIA and its operations. In fact, the record of our activities will show that over the years we have followed closely the operations of the USIA and have consistently supported the Agency in its needs for expansion and improvement. On occasions we have criticized it, but always with constructive intent. Our criticisms have never entailed the accusation that the Voice of America or the USIA is riddled with sabotaging Communists and subversives; nor do they now. This thought is, in a sense, passe and rather superficial at this time.

Some measure of sober thought will show that far more important and more critical at this time is the Agency's decision to eliminate the Uzbek language program and to curtail the Baltic, Ukrainian, Georgian, and perhaps even some other non-Russian language programs beamed to the Soviet Union. This decision cannot be said to rest solely on an allegedly technical argument of transmitter shortage. Instead, it clearly reflects certain policy directions for the VOA which are ill-advised, dangerous, and a bit absurd. We do not at all believe that the decision arrived at by Mr. George V. Allen, the Director of USIA, and also by the Department of State is the result, in any degree, of any subversive Communist or pro-Russian influence operating within these areas. Nevertheless we are convinced that this decision is the product of ignorance and intellectual incompetence as regards the nature of our mortal enemy, the aspirations and requirements of the captive nations both within and outside the Soviet Union, and as regards the modes of effective appeal to the subjugated non-Russian peoples in the U.S.S.R.

After all, to any informed person the broad non-Russian periphery of the Soviet Union is the solar plexis of the Russian Communist Empire. Its sons and daughters make up about 50 percent of the armed forces of the U.S.S.R. In over three decades of Russian Communist domination, the non-Russian colonies within the U.S.S.R. consistently and steadfastly resisted Russian imperial power and rule. From these facts alone it should be obvious that, in terms of U.S. security interests, the non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. constitute a high priority target for U.S. information and propaganda. A broadened and skillful aim at this vital target would successfully turn the tables on spurious Russian propaganda concerning colonialism, nationalism, and independence in Asia and Africa. Unfortunately, this is not evident to Mr. Allen and USIA.

This committee should be properly informed of the background to the decision taken by USIA. I myself became involved in this from the very start and several distinguished Members of Congress openly expressed their grave concern over these developments as they became increasingly clearer in intent and purpose.

The first indication of moves along these lines was given in an article written by Earl H. Voss in the Sunday Star of January 19. The article indicated that thought was being given to the elimination of the Uzbek broadcast and also to the possibility of imitating BBC in having only the Russian language broadcasts beamed to the U.S.S.R. The latter implies, of course, the abolition of the other non-Russian language broadcasts, such as the Lithuanian, Ukrainian, etc. In a letter, dated January 23, I addressed myself to Mr. Allen for confirmation of this. In his reply of February 4, Ambassador Allen stated that a study was being made along these lines. I had no doubt in my mind that papers were being submitted, urging these steps.

A week later it was my privilege to discuss this matter with the USIA director in his office. Among other things, I stated then that close observers of this situation had the feeling that such proposals to contract the VOA in these and, later, other areas of the Communist empire are tied up with a move to be soft toward the Russians in preparation for a summit conference. Let us recall that this was the period of another large-scale push for a summit conference executed by Bulganin and Khrushchev in their intercontinental missive warfare and abetted here by the irregular activities of the deceitfully smiling Soviet Ambassador. This push was strongly facilitated by the usual naive forces of appeasement here.

The developments covering VOA cannot be understood in void of this empirical context. In our discussion of over 1 hour Mr. Allen didn't even allude to any problem of transmitter shortage that would compel the curtailment of the non-Russian language programs. Instead, he appeared to be most concerned about the unfavored prospect of "splinterizing"—as he put it—the Soviet Union. Drawing on his own observations in Yugoslavia and India, Mr. Allen indicated to me that present-day political movements, as in Western Europe, for instance, are toward larger political entities rather than toward smaller national states. Moreover, through cultural exchanges and similar arrangements, which invariably devolve to the benefit of Moscow, the USIA director felt that we could make solid strides toward peace with the U.S.S.R. It is interesting that his testimony divulged the fact that the Russian Kuznetzov was allowed to survey our VOA apparatus which many Americans have regarded as our psychological weapon against Moscow.

Now, I realize that this is oral evidence which may be denied or sharply qualified by Mr. Allen. It would be profitable to hear his views on these points publicly. However, it will be readily admitted that his views as expressed to me bear close plausible relationship to the changes under examination. It was quite clear to me then, and is so now, that Mr. Allen doesn't understand the major problems of the Soviet Union or, more accurately, those of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic in its domination over the captive non-Russian nations within the U.S.S.R. As shown by his communications, for example, these nations are merely "minority groups" with "minority languages," as though they were counterparts to minority groups we have here. If the blanket of U.S.S.R. were legalistically thrown over Poland and it became a republic like Lithuania or Ukraine, then, according to his lights, the Polish nation would become another "minority group."

These points, Mr. Chairman, are crucial to the issue at hand. The effectiveness of the VOA depends on the content and direction of its programs and only secondarily on the quality and quantity of its technical instruments. My comments to Mr. Allen about the Uzbek program and our pitiful showing generally in relation to the 17 million Turkestani in central Asia received an important assist later from an article written by C. L. Sulzberger in the New York Times issue of March 1. I should like to submit this article on "Moscow's Huge Colonialist Hoax" for the record.

Several weeks later, as our original suspicions on the correlation between the summit push and the proposed changes became more firmly grounded, initiative was taken to submit a memorandum on the subject. A number of American organizations which follow such matters with close attentiveness prepared a memorandum on "The Prospect of Another Summit Conference." In their behalf, at the end of April, Senators H. ALEXANDER SMITH and PAUL H. DOUGLAS and also Congressmen WALTER JUDD and MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN jointly presented this memorandum to Secretary of State Dulles. In the discussion of its contents Secretary Dulles expressed his wholehearted agreement with the views and recommendations set forth in the memorandum. Significantly enough, point 4 in the memorandum calls for increasing the number of non-Russian language broadcasts to the U.S.S.R. It is little wonder, then, that Senator DOUGLAS was later aroused to say: "It is * * * shocking to learn that the Voice of America is now engaged in a series of actions which do violence to one of the major proposals with which Secretary Dulles expressed his agreement." Mr. Chairman, permit me to submit also for the record the excellent statement made by Senator DOUGLAS on this vital issue and the memorandum referred to above.

Against this background to the transmitter shortage pretext for the curtailment of the several non-Russian language broadcasts to the U.S.S.R., I wish to add these remarks concerning content effectiveness of the VOA. The reason why we lag far behind Moscow in effective propaganda appeal and commit some inexcusable blunders is explained in basic terms from a significant passage in one of Vice President NIXON'S latest addresses. Speaking to the Harvard Business School Association, Mr. NIXON stated in effect that the way to combat Russian Communist imperialism and colonialism is to revitalize the American Revolution. He urged that we should be standing for, not against, the nationalist movements in foreign countries. As he put it, "It is ironic in the extreme that the United States should ever be cast in the role of opposing legitimate nationalist movements. Many of the ideas which motivate today's nationalists stem from American history and have been taught in American universities at home and abroad * * *. We, rather than the Soviet Union, should be the natural champion of legitimate nationalist movements." How true this is, especially among the captive non-Russian nations both within and outside the U.S.S.R. Yet how thoroughly negated this American view is by what is going on in the Voice today.

To a marked degree the decision made by the USIA works to Moscow's advantage. Due to ignorance and the lack of that American revolutionary dedication which Mr. NIXON has in mind it can only do serious damage to United States and free world interests. The steps now being taken by USIA will actually work in behalf of Mr. Khrushchev's aims as conveyed to Mr. Adlai Stevenson on his recent visit to the Soviet Union. "Mr. Khrushchev was saying," Stevenson reports, "that whatever goes on in the Communist world is a family affair and doesn't concern outsiders, that Soviet oppression of the uprising in Hungary in 1956 was not interference, and that Soviet pressure on Yugoslavia to conform to Moscow is not a case of meddling in another country's affairs. But Khrushchev also made it clear that what went on in the free world is a proper concern of the Soviet Union." (The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., Aug. 27, 1958.) Whether USIA is aware of it or not, its actions on the non-Russian language broadcasts will be serving these aims. These are the same aims that Khrushchev has endeavored to realize through a summit meeting. By its present shortsighted policy in the Voice, the USIA is helping him to achieve this in some degree.

In discussing this issue it must be emphasized that this had absolutely nothing to do with official talk and programing leading to premature revolt and the like. It has to do with policy wisdom and propaganda efficacy. The Voice is not only a technical instrument for the transmission of factual information. It is also—or should be—a psychological weapon employed for the prime purpose of influencing minds and hearts to the justice and political integrity and intentions of our side in the global struggle. Anyone listening to Mr. Allen and his associates explain the purposes of the Voice leaves with the distinct impression that the Voice is simply an innocuous medium set up to inform the rest of the world about what Americans are doing in their everyday existence and living. They just don't seem to evince a propaganda acumen aimed at progressively weakening the enemy by carefully designed programs and words. In a real sense, the enemy isn't even looked upon as one. There isn't that ardor or fervor in the Agency that qualifies the leadership to undertake those things implied by Vice President NIXON. The revolutionary spirit is lacking and the goal of defeating the enemy by word and thought is virtually nonexistent.

Now let's look at the issue. It was recently decided by USIA and, I feel sure, also by elements in the Department of State that certain changes in connection with VOA broadcasts to the Soviet Union take place at the beginning of October. The changes are (1) the elimination of the regular 15-minute daily program in the Moslem Uzbek language beamed from Munich to central Asia, (2) the reduction of 1 hour each in the daily Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, and Ukrainian programs, and (3) an increase in English-language programs beamed to the U.S.S.R. as well as a half-hour increase in the Russian language program.

These changes will have some unfavorable bearing on U.S. relations with the Moslemic peoples, not only in the U.S.S.R. but also with those knowledgeable Moslems in Asia, Africa, and the Middle East. Our relations, such as they are, with the other non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. will likewise be adversely affected. These changes, which we believe the Secretary of State is unaware of, lack adequate justification. In fact, they possess all the earmarks of the first step in a policy of psychological disengagement with regard to the entire Russian Communist Empire. Today, these areas; and with this success, tomorrow the external satellites in central Europe. It is noteworthy that the announcement of these changes was timed immediately after Congress made its appropriations to USIA.

Now what are, according to Mr. Allen, the reasons for these changes? Concerning (1) the Uzbek program, they are allegedly (a) to maximize our use of available transmitters, (b) insufficient evidence as to whether this program was being heard to an appreciable extent, and (c) a scarcity of available funds, or transmitters or of qualified personnel. On close examination these reasons for eliminating the Uzbek program are weak, to say the least. This change is further evidence of our gross ineptitude in the propaganda field. The height of this ineptitude is revealed by the fact that while Moscow today is building tremendous radio facilities in Tashkent to influence the free Moslem world to its ways of thinking, we propose to abolish the only meager program in VOA aimed at the unfree Moslems in Central Asia. The New York Times editorial of July 22 on "Khrushchev and the Moslems," which I should like to include in the record of these hearings, indicates further the absurdity of this change. Instead of displaying greater interest in the enslaved brethren of the free Moslem world, by this step we propose to ignore them.

What a sad contrast this is to the spirit that inspired the message of Secretary of State Dean Acheson on June 29, 1951, when VOA broadcasts to the Turkestani, Volga-Tatars, and the Moslem Azerbaijani were commenced. He declared:

"I am very happy to have this opportunity to say a few words to the Moslem peoples of the Soviet Union. For some while now the Voice of America has been bringing its message of truth and liberty to the people of the free world including the Islamic peoples of Asia and Africa. Today we are proud to broadcast to the Tatar, the Azerbaijani and the Turkestani peoples in the U.S.S.R. who for more than three decades have been denied access to the truth by the Communists.

"We Americans admire the brave manner in which all the peoples of the Soviet Union, including the Tatars, the Azerbaijanis, and the Turkestanis are striving to maintain their religions, their traditions, their own way of life, despite the efforts of the Communist regime to replace religion with godlessness, to replace the glorious histories of the peoples of the Soviet Union with the false folklore of Stalinism.

"The people of the United States have a friendly regard for the Moslem peoples of the U.S.S.R. The proud history of the Tatars of the Volga who have maintained their ancient culture and traditions despite all obstacles; the brave Azerbaijanis and other mountain people of the Caucasus whose centuries-old struggle for their human rights have provided some of history's most glorious pages; the people of Turkestan whose ancient cities of Bokhara, Samarkand, Merv and Tashkent represent monuments of a lofty culture; these, like the other God-fearing peoples of the Soviet Union are regarded by us Americans as stanch pillars against atheistic, materialistic tyranny.

"The Voice of America will henceforth bring you in your own language the truth which the Communists fear and try to keep from you. We shall tell you what is happening in the free world and particularly in those regions of the free world linked with you by religion, tradition, and culture. We shall keep you informed of the aggressive actions of those disturbing the world peace. We shall tell you how free men are standing firm against the further spread of despotism.

"As I said last month to the people of Georgia, the goal of the American people and their Government is a peaceful world where all men can live and work freely and happily, without want or fear and with the right to worship God in their own way. This is our vision of the future; we invite you to share it.

"I extend to you Moslems of the Soviet Union, in the name of the American people, our sincere, friendly greetings."

On the basis of known facts, I would add to this splendid message the spirit of nationalism which the various Moslem nations and peoples in the Russian Communist empire share with their brethren in the free world. This nationalistic force, which we are not tapping at all, is even more important than their common religion.

Thus, in terms of political rationality and advantage, it is evident that if transmitters are to be usefully maximized they certainly should be in the direction of the Moslems in central Asia. There is considerably more evidence demonstrating Turkestanian opposition to Russian communism and its imperialist colonialism over the past 40 years than can be shown in favor of the Russians, against their own Moscow regime to whom we devote a disproportionate amount of VOA time and facilities. By political analysis the 35 million Moslems in the U.S.S.R. have a higher target priority over most of the areas in the free world to which we beam VOA broadcasts. Second, the reason of "insufficient evidence" on the reception of this program raises the question as to what kind of evidence USIA is seeking on the basis of an admittedly puny operation directed at these people? And a third, Mr. Allen relies heavily on lack of resources; thus no effective program. Clearly, if he understood this problem, he would recognize that the cause-and-effect sequence is really the other way around: This is a vitally important target area; thus we must have an effective program; therefore, resources must be made available to it, even at the cost of less important areas. The resources, both human and physical could be made available if we were at all serious about this particular operation.

Let us look now at USIA's reasons for cutting down the Baltic and Ukrainian language programs. It contends (a) that such reductions will permit a more concentrated use of transmitters in order to overcome the heavy jamming of these programs and (b) that "the concentration of transmitters on particular programs necessarily decreases the number of programs which these transmitters can carry." The extra time, however—again according to Mr. Allen—will be devoted to English-Russian language programs beamed to the U.S.S.R. and, by way of a half-hour increase, to the Russian-language program, both of which, quite significantly, are not subjected by Moscow to such heavy jamming. As in the preceding case, these reductions are equally unjustified and unwise for our interests.

At this juncture I should like to bring to the committee's attention an apparent contradiction in the stand taken by USIA on the matter of Russian language broadcasts. In correspondence with our legislators who inquired into this, USIA officials explicity state that the time taken from the curtailed non-Russian language broadcasts will be given to increase Russian language broadcasts; that, as one puts it, "Under the new plan, programs originated in Russian will be increased by one-half hour." Yet, when this matter was raised during Mr. Allen's testimony, he and his aids bent forward to stress that the Russian programs will be reduced. Could it be that the new plan has suddenly been altered or are different things said in different places? This point deserves some clarification.

Now, another point which should be of keen interest to any legislator voting on USIA appropriations is "Why does Moscow jam these particular non-Russian broadcasts most heavily, whereas our English and Russian language broadcasts are less or not jammed at all?" One can only reasonably infer that Moscow fears these latter broadcasts less. This striking fact of disproportionate jamming, supported by Mr. Allen's own written admissions, is indeed a sound point of departure for an inquiry into these cases and also the relative contents or sensitive aspects of these programs. Commonsense would dictate steps of concentration and expansion of the non-Russian broadcasts because of the excessive jamming. Our authorities prefer not to follow such dictates. Instead, on the flimsy pretext of transmitter shortage, they have decided to reduce these sensitive programs and, of all things, allocate the extra time to the far less sensitive English and Russian language broadcasts. In the case of the Ukrainian broadcast, this is being done at the very time when radio Kiev in Ukraine is expanding its facilities to reach the millions of Ukrainian background everywhere in the free world.

Mr. Allen makes the plausible point that these changes, by virtue of transmitter concentration, will enable us to overcome the heavy jamming. This is all to the good. But it does not in itself justify the allocation of the extra time to the English and Russian language broadcasts. Indeed, with concentration of transmitters for the non-Russian language broadcasts, this time and more should be devoted to these evidently more sensitive programs. As in the Moslem case above, there is again much more evidence to show that we have considerably more to gain by concentrating on these Baltic, Urkrainian, and other non-Russian broadcasts to the U.S.S.R. than on either the English or Russian language programs. That is, unless our self-defeating goal is eventually to imitate BBC and have these captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. listen, if they will at all, in the language of their captor. The changes now decided upon are certainly in this direction, one of psychological disengagement. While from Moscow Ukrainians are told to like the Russians, it now appears that from Washington they are being told to listen like Russians. ("Ukrainians Are Told To Like the Russians," New York Herald Tribune, Mar. 14, 1958.) Mr. Chairman, here, too, I should like to insert into the record this interesting report on Ukrainians being told to like the Russians and to curb their "bourgeois nationalism."

The second reason offered by Mr. Allen is not without a certain logical flaw. For the moment let's agree that transmitter concentration necessarily decreases the number of programs. Still, why more time and programs for Russian and English language broadcasts? For, applying his own formula, this presumably means more programs on fewer transmitters per program. Or, are more transmitters per more programs the rule for them and not for the particular non-Russian programs? Here, too, one runs into a priority valuation. Very simply, if it is conceded that the U.S.S.R. has top priority for our broadcasts, then why can't more transmitters be made available at this time to our broadcasts to the Soviet Union at the expense of less sensitive programs to areas with lower priority? This is another sensible alternative and in accord with the view of every legislator who believes "that the purpose of this agency was to combat the propaganda of the Soviet Union." (The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 14, p. 18782.)

In Mr. Allen's view the languages of the Lithuanians, Latvians, Estonians, Ukrainians, Turkestanis are minority languages of minority groups. This, perhaps more than any other fact, explains these unthought changes. The recent study of the Senate Judiciary Committee on The Soviet Empire: Prison House of Nations and Races, and many other studies, particularly those of the Select House Committee To Investigate Communist Aggression, show that the non-Russian nations have striven desperately to preserve their distinctive languages and other cultural identities against the Russification programs of Moscow. Ironically enough, and regardless of its alleged reasons, the Voice in effect abets Moscow's Russification program by emphasizing communication in Russian to the subjugated non-Russian peoples. This seems to be the best way to alienate your natural friends and aid your enemy.

The recourse to expanded English broadcasts to the U.S.S.R. appears almost as ludicrous in terms of the global psychological conflict. Are we perchance attempting to Anglicize the peoples behind the Iron Curtain? The present movement in American education is to have our people learn the languages of other peoples primarily in order to understand them better, to make warm contact with them. Evidently the tendency in the Voice is contrary to this movement and its objectives. USIA's fantastic formula is: reduce the programs in the language of the masses, have them listen more in the language of their captor, and the relative few who wish to perfect their English, very likely for political ends against our own interest, let's accommodate them, too.

In conclusion, then, to predicate these politically unwise changes on the technical ground of transmitter shortage is in itself cause for wonderment concerning the objectives and purposes of VOA as well as the propaganda competence of its managers, especially in relation to the logically high priority targets within the Soviet Union itself. Moreover, the manipulations of time and facilities in favor of English and Russian-language broadcasts at the expense of the more sensitive non-Russian broadcasts—and this despite the general condition of transmitter shortage—only serve to intensify this wonderment. Also, one cannot but seriously question the proffered technical argument. If the non-Russian areas in the U.S.S.R. are objectively recognized to be high-priority targets existing in the immediate environment of the colonial Russian Communist enemy, then it would appear that a reallocation of transmitters is in order—at this time even at the expense of low-priority areas in the free world. In this connection, one might ask whether any thought has been given to the use of our "floating transmitters" for broadcasts to Ukraine, the Baltic area, the Caucasus, and Turkestan? Why couldn't these be used somewhere near Turkey or Pakistan to meet the requirements of these high-priority target areas? Furthermore, if jamming is characteristic of VOA broadcasts, it must be equally so for Radio Liberation broadcasts out of Munich. In considering immediate alternatives, has a joint use of Radio Liberation transmitters been considered in the interest of economy, efficient concentration, and plain propaganda effectiveness? All sorts of legalistic reasons for not considering Radio Liberation in this present moment of supposed transmitter urgency will not do in the light of all facts in the situation.

We strongly recommend to this committee the following: (1) That every effort be exerted to forestall the implementation of these ill-considered changes and that steps be taken to realize the proposals with which Secretary Dulles himself is in accord; (2) that this committee undertake in the near future a field inspection of VOA transmitters and have along with it an independent radio engineer for purposes of critical assessment of the reasons given by USIA; (3) that a review of the policy and aims of USIA and the VOA be conducted in the next session of Congress since this hasn't been done for many years now; and (4) that the committee, preparatory to such a comprehensive review, examine sampled contents of VOA broadcasts to the captive non-Russian nations both within and outside the U.S.S.R. or, in other words, to both the "internal" and "external satellites" of imperial Moscow. We have done this for the Ukrainian-language broadcasts, taking as a significant base period the anniversary celebrations of Ukrainian Independence Day in January. This summary analysis, which I submit for the record, clearly shows some of the reasons why the VOA lacks psychological punch and political effectiveness when it comes to supporting the forces of freedom in the enemy's camp.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleagues may be permitted to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRESTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, wars always cause death and destruction, leaving misery and destitution as their inevitable and ugly legacy. Sometimes they bring about the overthrow of despotic and detested autocracies, and thus inadvertently set free oppressed and subject peoples. World War I did both of these: it caused death to tens of millions, but also, as the result of that war, numerous nationality groups in Eastern and Central Europe, where they were suffering under alien rulers in their homelands, regained their freedom. The Ukrainian independence was one of the happy byproducts of that war.

Since mid-17th century the Ukraine had been submerged in the Russian continent. During all that time, for more than 250 years, the Russians had done their worst to suppress and eradicate Ukrainian national feeling and all its attendant traits: Their desire for freedom, their boundless love for their homeland, their undying yearning for political independence, and their readiness to sacrifice their all for the attainment of their national goal. But all the efforts of callous Russian authorities were of no avail, and the Ukrainians clung firmly and steadfastly to their fine ideals. Toward the end of the First World War, when the czar's autocracy was overthrown, and Austria could no longer hold western Ukraine, the Ukrainian leaders seized upon the occasion and proclaimed their national independence. That was on January 22, 1918, the day on which the Ukrainian Republic came into being.

Unfortunately the newborn republic was under severe handicaps: she was frail and fragile, and no allies close enough and ready to help her. The war-torn country was in ruins, fertile Ukraine was a wasteland. Most of its inhabitants were uprooted from their homes, and the normal course of life sadly disrupted. These were terrible problems for a new government to face, but even more serious and ominous, was the Communist Russian threat. Before the Ukrainian Government had the chance to bring some order out of the existing chaos, it was attacked by the Red army, the country was overrun early in 1920, and the Ukrainian Republic ceased to exist. Then the country was incorporated into the Soviet Union.

Since then the Ukrainians have suffered more under the Soviet tyranny than under the autocratic czars. Today their fair land is shut off from the free world, and events there, like those on the dark side of the moon, are not known to the world outside. We know for certain that under the Soviet system of totalitarian dictatorship the Ukrainians are not allowed to celebrate their national independence day. That supreme privilege is denied them by their cruel overlords. But Ukrainians of the free world, and hundreds of thousands of Americans of Ukrainian descent, celebrate that day as the symbol of their free and independent spirit. I am glad to join them in the celebration of this holiday, the Ukrainian Independence Day.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the Ukraine is a large country in Eastern Europe, and a crossroad between East and West. For more than 300 years most of it was held by Russian czars and today it is held in its entirety by Russian Communist tyrants. During all that time the Ukrainians, numbering more than 40 million unfortunate but sturdy and stouthearted souls, have been held down as a subject nation by their powerful conqueror-masters. But even in that long period of misfortune and misery they have not given up; their alien overlords have never succeeded in eradicating Ukrainian nationalism. Throughout those years they have maintained their love of freedom, their national ideals, and their goal of political independence. Toward the end of the First World War, when they saw the chance of realizing their dream, they declared their national independence on January 22 of 1918.

Unfortunately, the Ukrainian Republic, proclaimed 41 years ago, was surrounded by envious and implacable enemies, all eagerly waiting to crush it. Early in 1920 the new state was attacked and overrun by Communist Russians, and since then it has been submerged in the Soviet Union. There they do not enjoy many of the elementary necessities of a decent and simple life, nor do they have any of the freedoms enjoyed by free men in the free world. Hundreds of thousands of loyal and patriotic Americans of Ukrainian ancestry, who have become citizens of this great Republic, today celebrate the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. I gladly join them in the celebration of this solemn and memorable event.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, on the 41st anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to the Ukrainian people throughout the world, who are dedicated to the belief that freedom is the right of all nations. Those outside the Iron Curtain are an inspiration to their enslaved fellow Ukrainians and all peoples who struggle for liberation from tyranny. I salute the Ukrainian people in their continuing fight for the right of people to live in decency and dignity—free from oppression and dictatorship.

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, another anniversary of the independence of Ukraine—the 41st in the annals of that captive nation's history—is being observed on January 22. Unfortunately, the 40 million people of the Ukraine are not free to partake of this event and to commemorate it in freedom.

The Ukraine was one of the first countries to become victim of Communist aggression when Soviet Russia occupied it in 1920, destroyed its independence and enslaved its people. Since then millions of Ukrainians have been starved to death, especially during the Communist-made famine of the 1930's. The people of Ukraine have been dealt with harshly and ruthlessly throughout this long nightmare of more than four decades.

Nevertheless, the hopes and aspirations of the Ukraine nation have not been erased either by time or by Moscow's deceitful campaigns of smiles and coexistence. Their faith in God and in the future revival of their people continues to remain strong. They continue to strive for freedom and liberation from communism.

It remains for us of the free world to help them sustain that faith in God and humanity, in their own inevitable freedom and in their survival. Words of encouragement and sympathetic expressions of understanding of their plight will mean a great deal to these people in their hours of desperation.

On the occasion of this anniversary, which holds out a ray of hope and sunshine to the people of the Ukraine and their kinsmen in America, we express our solidarity with them in their struggle. We pray that their wishes and hopes will soon be realized and their ancestral homeland will once again be a free and independent country.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, 41 years ago a band of brave and patriotic Ukrainians unfurled the banner of revolt against their oppressors and proclaimed the Ukraine's independence. That marked the revival of an old cherished national dream. As a result of the Russian Revolution, czarist autocracy was shattered, and it was only natural that the largest non-Russian ethnic element in Russia's loosely held polyglot empire should be among the first to assert its freedom and proclaim its national political independence. But wartime events, over which the Ukrainians had no control, and unforeseen sweeping postwar international convulsions which quickly succeeded one another, proved too costly and disastrous to the newly proclaimed independent state. Against formidable odds, the independent Ukraine could not hold out for long; she was forced to surrender to the Red army in November of 1920, and thus bring to a close a short but brilliant chapter in her history.

Today, the Ukraine is the second largest Socialist Republic in the Soviet Union, second only in size and in population, and also in importance, to the Russian Socialist Republic. Some 40-odd million Ukrainians constitute about a fifth of the Soviet Union's total population. The Ukraine has always been one of the most fertile grain-producing areas in Europe. As a matter of fact, the whole Soviet Union is dependent to a great extent for its grain supply and for a large variety of other foodstuffs on the Ukraine. Without the food produced by the hard-working Ukrainians the people of the Soviet Union would probably be on the verge of famine. And its mines and factories produce essential industrial products.

It is truly tragic that so many millions of Ukrainians, constituting such an important segment of the European Community, and possessing distinct national characteristics, do not enjoy today any of the elemental privileges and amenities of life which are considered, in free societies in the West, as the birthright of all human beings. If the Ukrainians were allowed some freedom, and if they were in a position to realize part of their national aspirations, they would have established a democratic government based upon those freedoms necessary for their full cultural, intellectual, and spiritual development. Unfortunately, however, such has not been their lot. For almost four decades conditions have not been normal in the Ukraine, and the people there have been fated to suffer under the detested Communist tyranny.

For long periods in their modern history the unhappy Ukrainians have lived under conditions not at all suited to the wholesome development of their political, intellectual, social, and economic life. The geography of their country and modern international politics have largely determined the course of their history. Situated between important centers of power—between Europe and Eurasia—the Ukrainians have not had the opportunity to pursue an independent national existence. Though older than the state of modern Russia, they long ago came under the control of Moscow. Until the rise of the Russian Communist regime the Ukrainians made the best of a bad situation and managed to get along with the Russians. Since the advent of communism, however, tragedy has been their lot.

It is hard to believe, and it is sad to think, that more than 40 million patriotic and sturdy Ukrainians have had to put up with such an oppressive government for nearly 40 years. For almost four decades Communists have ruled the Ukraine with an iron hand. They have turned that fair land into one large prison house. Since 1920 there has not been any semblance of freedom of any kind in the country. The barbarians of the Kremlin have seen to it that there be no such western trappings in the Ukraine.

In such total darkness and depression, in total misery and endless suffering, there is one indestructible, ineradicable element of encouragement. That is the Ukrainian's innate and inborn desire for freedom and independence, his unquenchable yearning for liberty. Fortunately neither the tyrants of Moscow, nor their minions in the Ukraine, can extinguish this spirit of freedom and of independence which all liberty-loving Ukrainians claim as their birthright. As long as that noble spirit is kept alive, as long as the ideal of national freedom is cherished by the Ukrainians, no dictatorship or tyranny can rob the Ukrainians of their real independence—the independence of their souls and hearts. As long as they possess this spirit, they will never give up their resistance to the Red tyrants.

I am indeed glad to join in the celebration of the 41st Independence Day of the Ukraine. I ardently hope that your wishes and desires will come true, that the oppressed Ukraine will regain her independence, and that once more the unfortunate Ukrainians will enjoy the fruits of freedom in their beloved and beautiful homeland.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in observing the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian independence, we should also pay tribute to the Ukrainian people for the constant fight which they have continued for centuries to bring about an independent self-government. The year 1917 brought great tidings and joy to millions of Ukrainians with the hope that victory had finally been won and that freedom would permanently be had for these long generations battling for independence. Unfortunately, one of its oldtime neighbors and enemies terminated this dream of self-government and today we find Ukraine under the tyrannical domination of the Soviet Socialist Republics.

Ukraine lies on the shores of the Black Sea and extends from the Carpathian Mountains to the Donets Basin and Kryvy Rih and Don River. This area comprises the richest and most productive soil in the world. Unlimited coal and iron deposits are in this section. By reason of the unlimited wealth in Nature's soil and mineral deposits the Turks, Russians, and all of the powerful tyrants in history have sought to control Ukraine. It is the earnest hope of the people throughout the world that a nation which has fought for centuries for liberty will someday be rewarded with self-government and permanent peace.

When the Soviet Communists first invaded Ukrainia after World War I, they were as much interested in plundering the peasants to secure grain and food as they were in capturing the country. The peasants resisted and the leaders of the nation fought to the bitter end to maintain their independence. After heroic resistance by the Ukrainian people in 1930 came the Soviet order for compulsory collectivism organization of all the land and products of the nation. Naturally this aroused tremendous opposition. In many places the Ukrainian people killed their cattle rather than turn them over and the general revolt against the Soviet tyrants was rampant among the farmers of the nation.

In 1931 and 1932, Stalin and his henchmen inflicted their manmade tyranny which caused starvation to millions and sent others into Soviet prisons and labor camps. The story of Ukrainia since that time has been sad and sorrowful but to the everlasting credit of Ukrainians throughout the world, their spirit and desires for freedom and independence still survives with the same intensity that it has back through the centuries. With the aid of free nations and the fact that millions throughout the world are rapidly learning the true facts about atheistic communism and its leaders, it is our hope that the day is not too far distant when internal rebellion behind the Iron Curtain, with the aid of freedom loving people on the outside, will bring independence to the Ukrainian people and other satellite countries now under the Soviet tyranny.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, today in our distracted and divided world hundreds of millions of innocent and helpless people are suffering under Communist tyrannies. More than 200 million of these have been forced to endure the almost unbearable yoke of the Soviet regime for more than four decades, and among these unfortunate souls the Ukrainians have borne the brunt of Russion communism longer than others.

One of the happy results of World War I was the emergence of the Ukrainian Republic. After suffering under autocratic czars for centuries, early in 1918 Ukrainian leaders proclaimed their independence. That was on January 22, 41 years ago. Unfortunately for the Ukrainians and for their friends everywhere, the newborn state could not live long without outside aid. Such aid was not forthcoming to save it from its treacherous enemies. Early in 1920 it was attacked by the Red army, the country was overrun, and the independent Ukraine ceased to exist. Soon it was incorporated into the Soviet Union, and a part of that polyglot empire it remains to this day. There in their homeland, some 40 million sturdy and stouthearted Ukrainians live as in a huge prison camp.

As prisoners behind the veritable Iron Curtain and deprived of all forms of freedom, they cannot celebrate their national holiday, their independence day. But many hundreds of thousands Ukrainians who have found refuge in the free world, and especially in this great Republic, celebrate that historic event in fitting solemnity. I am glad to join these loyal Americans of Ukrainian descent on this 41st anniversary of the Ukrainian Independence Day.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, today, January 22, 1959, is the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine, and this event is commemorated by Ukrainians throughout the world who are joined by all people everywhere who cherish the spirit of freedom and independence, and pray that those nations which have been enslaved by Communist tyranny and domination may be liberated from the rule of Soviet Russia.

Ukraine, after centuries of fierce and valiant struggle by the Ukrainian people for liberty, finally achieved freedom as a nation on January 22, 1918. But Ukraine independence was of short duration, and the Ukrainian people were again subjected to enslavement by the Russian Communists by 1920.

The Ukrainian people have remained free in spirit in spite of all the efforts of the Communists to destroy the Ukrainian national identity, and wherever the Ukrainian people are found, the words of their historic national anthem will ring out, "Ukraine will never die."

The people of the United States believe in the right of liberty and freedom, and join with the Ukrainian people in the fervent hope that the yoke of the Communist dictators will be thrown off, and that the Ukrainian nation will again take its place among the free nations of the world.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, independence day celebrations are memorable events in all national histories, and among national holidays they occupy the highest place. Since freedom and independence are man's most cherished spiritual goals, it is fitting that the occasion of the realization and attainment be marked by solemn celebrations, evoking serious thoughts and eloquent expressions. Ukraine's short-lived but historic independence was attained toward the end of the First World War, when evil and autocratic forces chaining numerous nationality groups were shattered. On January 22, 1918, a band of brave Ukrainian leaders proclaimed Ukrainian independence and established the Ukraine Republic. But the Republic jubilantly proclaimed was not strong enough to stave off impending enemy attacks, and she could not count upon the badly needed aid of her friends and sympathizers. Early in 1920 she was savagely attacked by the Red army, the country was overrun and then incorporated into the Soviet Union.

Today for nearly four decades the Ukraine has been part of the Soviet Union and its unhappy inhabitants mere slave laborers in that vast prison camp. But even under the most despicable and detested tyranny, communist totalitarian dictatorship, the sturdy and stouthearted Ukrainian still cherishes his national ideals and eventual freedom. He also thinks of the day of 41 years ago when his homeland was independent and free. He would, of course, like to celebrate the anniversary of that memorable and venerated event in public, but that privilege, that elementary right, is denied to him by his masters in the Kremlin. But thousands and tens of thousands of Americans of Ukrainian descent celebrate it and echo the genuine sentiments of their kin in the Ukraine. I am glad to join these loyal American citizens in the observance of the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of this 41st anniversary of Ukraine's independence I wish to pay tribute to those valiant people and their struggle for freedom.

Ukrainians have a long tradition of national consciousness, born in ancient Kiev and nurtured through the centuries. The will for national liberty found fulfillment from the 9th to the 14th centuries, again in the 17th century, and most recently for a brief period, at the close of World War I.

For more than 2½ centuries after they were coerced into a union with the Russians in the middle of the 17th century, the unhappy Ukrainians lived under the regime of the tsars. During that time their Russian rulers did everything in their power to obliterate and destroy the free spirit of the Ukraine and to suppress all nationalistic aspirations. But they could not succeed in their destructive task. The spirit of freedom and independence lived in the hearts of the Ukrainians.

When the Russian Empire was shattered after the revolution of 1917, the people of the Ukraine, on January 22, 1918, proclaimed an independent national republic. Bold and courageous as this step was, it was destined to be nullified by the ruthless methods of Communist tyranny. The young Republic was not given time to grow and mature. In 1920 the hordes of the Red army swept into the Ukraine; the forces of destruction and tyranny once more robbed the Ukraine of its independence.

Since 1920 the Soviet regime has ruled the Ukraine with oppressive cruelty. Like the regime of the czars, the Communist tyranny has done everything in its power to destroy the national consciousness of the Ukrainians. The once happy country has become virtually a prison camp for 40 million Ukrainians.

However brutally this was accomplished, the flame of freedom could not be quenched. The aspiration for freedom had been strengthened by centuries of struggle. The tyrants of Moscow have not found it easy to destroy that tradition.

The Ukrainians have a historic right to national freedom. We in this country gladly celebrate this day for them. Let us all hope and pray that their long struggle will be rewarded and that they will again achieve freedom and independence.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, during World War I when the czarist regime was overthrown and the long oppressed Ukrainians regained their independence, they and their friends were overjoyed. Two years later, in 1920, when their liberated country was overrun by the Red army, and once more they were brought under the heels of the Kremlin, their friends were saddened. The only happy interlude in the Ukraine's unhappy history was the short 2-year period of 1918–20.

The Ukrainian Republic was proclaimed on January 22, 41 years ago. Even though they enjoyed freedom for only 2 years, the happy memories of those years were impressed upon them most profoundly. Since then they have regarded it as a period in their modern history of revival and regeneration, and they celebrate the first day of that period, January 22, as a national holiday. Of course in their homeland unhappy Ukrainians cannot do that under the detested Soviet Government. But many hundreds of thousands of loyal Americans of Ukrainian descent celebrate the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day and thus echo the true sentiments of their kin in the unfree Ukraine. I am glad to join them in this solemn celebration.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, today, January 22, is a day of great importance to Ukrainian Americans. It is of even greater importance to the Ukrainians who live under the domination of the Soviets. This day is celebrated each year as one means of holding forth hope for freedom and independence for these oppressed people.

One of the greatest assets in the struggle to maintain and extend the blessings of hope and liberty to all peoples throughout the world lies in the tremendous spirit of freedom which still burns in the hearts of those behind the Iron Curtain.

Ukrainia was one of the first nations to fall under the tyranny of the Bolshevik imperialists. Despite the destruction of her churches, mass deportations, purges and murders, Ukrainia's national spirit and her moral fiber have not dimmed. She will go down in world history books as a symbol of the struggle for freedom and independence.

With over 40 million people, the largest non-Russian nation behind the Iron Curtain, Ukrainia stands as important strategically in the eventful defeat of Soviet imperialism. She has a historic right to national freedom. Her independence cannot be ignored. We of the free world should stand stanchly behind this right of the Ukrainians if we are to be assured that the foundations of liberty and independence for all nations are to be preserved.

In a day of missiles and nuclear weapons, it is well to take time on this 41st anniversary of the creation of the Ukrainian Republic to remember this: The power of the human spirit and its eternal craving for freedom is a greater force against tyranny than our most destructive hydrogen bomb. To those in bondage behind the Iron Curtain we must give our continued assurance that their resistance is not in vain, that theirs is not a forgotten front.

Our country is the stronger today for their efforts, just as it is richer for the contributions their brothers have made here. May the time not be far off when all may join in the celebration of a new and lasting independence.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, today, January 22, 1959, friends of freedom all over the United States are observing the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. This day on which we commemorate the most important event in modern Ukrainian history is of great significance to a million and a half men and women of Ukrainian blood whose industry, character, and devotion have made major contributions to education and culture as well as to the industrial side of American life. As we pay tribute to them as Americans, we cannot lose sight of the fact that while they treasure in their hearts love for the freedom they have achieved for themselves and their children in America, their hearts are saddened by the bondage of their blood brothers and sisters in the Ukraine.

More than 300 years ago, Ukraine, an independent state, was a center of culture, a state with thriving commerce that linked Europe and Asia. The defeat of the Ukrainian Army allied with that of Charles XII of Sweden at the battle of Poltava—1709—ushered in a period of Russian domination of the Ukraine, a domination whose purpose was liquidation of the Ukraine as an independent nation. Thousands of her people who were sent north to build St. Petersburg—Russia's "window into Europe"—died of starvation and exhaustion. Ukrainian scholars, artists, educators, legislators, and engineers were sent to Russia to serve the purpose of westernizing that country.

At the very time that the United States was achieving independence the remnants of Ukrainian freedom were being eradicated by Russian troops under orders from Catherine II. Although independence was destroyed, the Ukrainian national ideal and desire for independence seem to achieve immortality. Ukrainian language and traditions were kept alive by the peasantry in folksongs which glorified the past, especially the heroic struggles for independence. The folksongs and especially the historical dumy were sung at village and town bazaars, church and social gatherings. Thus was the historical record preserved and the way paved for the powerful Ukrainian literary and political revival of the 19th century.

In 1846 a Ukrainian political organization, the Society of St. Cyril and Methodius was founded in Kiev. It demanded freedom of conscience, of the press, of thought and speech, and the abolition of serfdom. It envisioned an independent state within the larger framework of a slavic federation to be dominated by no one country. A Ukrainian poet asked: "When will we receive our Washington, with a new and righteous law?"

However, the discovery of the society by the czarist police was followed by repression. Members were arrested and imprisoned or deported to Siberia. Once more political oppression descended upon Ukraine. The Ukrainian language was banned, even the name was changed to Malorossiya—Little Russia. On the eve of World War I Ukraine had become a forgotten nation.

The abdication of the Czar Nicholas II was regarded by the Ukrainians as a hopeful sign which meant the ushering in of a new era for their captive country. In this hope they were joined by the Lithuanians, Finns, Poles, Latvians, Estonians, Byelorussians, and others.

The Ukrainian peasantry, the backbone of the nation, had never been Russified. It provided many thousands of active patriots. Teachers and students although relatively small in number, provided leadership.

Early in March 1917 Ukrainian political parties began to emerge from the underground. The Ukrainian Revolutionary Party—RUP—urged complete separation of Ukraine from Russia. There was a Communist Party in Ukraine but it was staffed almost completely by Russian Bolsheviks.

RUP and other parties which developed as well as representatives of the various Ukrainian organizations led the Ukrainian National Revolution.

These patriotic Ukrainians demanded political freedom, freedom of the language, and Ukrainization of the army stationed in Ukraine. They demanded immediate release of deported Ukrainians.

On March 17, 1917 the principal Ukrainian organizations and parties, banding together, established the Ukrainian Central Council—Rada—and assumed leadership of the Ukrainian people. It pointed out that the moment for true liberation had arrived and called upon the Ukrainian people to carve out with a strong hand a new and free existence. For the first time in more than a century and a half a Ukrainian political body had arisen to speak to the Ukrainian people in their behalf.

Rada was followed by the All-Ukrainian National Congress in Kiev. Fifteen hundred delegates, representing organizations, societies, and parties met amid such nationalistic fervor that when the representative of the Russian provisional government endeavored to address the body he was shouted down and forced to speak in Ukrainian.

The Congress expressed firm adherence to the principle of self-determination and insisted that Ukraine be admitted to future peace negotiations.

This All-Ukrainian National Congress marked the end of the first period of the Ukrainian National Revolution and ushered in an intensification of the struggle between the Ukrainians and the Russian provisional government.

July 29, 1917, the Constitution of Ukraine was drafted. November 7, 1917, the rule of the provisional government was brought to an end and a Communist regime assumed the power and authority in Russia. The convening of the Third Ukrainian Military Congress indicated that the Ukraine was heading for a definite break with Russia. November 20, 1917, the Ukrainian National Republic was proclaimed. The Ukrainian Central Rada was confronted by the fact that, confronted by bolshevism, it must either recognize the Lenin government or oppose it. December 17, 1917, the Bolshevik government issued an ultimatum which was followed by an armed attack of 50,000 fanatical Communist troops against Ukraine.

January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian Central Rada proclaimed the Ukrainian National Republic an independent and sovereign power of the Ukrainian people, subject to no other authority. This marked the formal and official restoration of the independence of the Ukrainian nation, an independence which had been lost to Russia some 250 years before.

Freedom was in the hands of the Ukrainian people, only to be wrenched away by the Russian Bolsheviks after 4 years of bloody struggle. Had the Ukraine survived as an independent state, the Soviet regime would have been deprived of the great "breadbasket" and "sugar bowl" as well as a great store of natural resources.

Communist rule in the Ukraine was one of unrelenting severity and harshness which at least equaled that of the czars. Again the use of the Ukrainian language was forbidden, deportation, even outright genocide, were practiced all in the name of true freedom. In perennial purges the Russians decimated the Ukrainian intelligentsia and leadership. Periodic manmade famines such as that of 1932–33 evoked worldwide protests including official condemnation by the League of Nations. Despite the unhuman treatment they have received the spirit of Ukrainian freedom and independence marches on. At present they are fighting for emancipation of the Ukrainian language and they have never given up the fight for a true Ukraine governed only by Ukrainians. Many of their heroes are dead or imprisoned; but the Ukrainian nation lives on.

Ukraine has been in the forefront of the non-Russian nations in the struggle to throw off the Russian yokes. The more the Russians persecute and exploit the Ukraines the more determined are they to win back their freedom.

With all Ukrainians and with those of Ukrainian blood in the United States, I join my hopes and my prayers that the day is not too far distant when we shall see an end of Russian imperial communism.

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, sometimes it is difficult to satisfy the spiritual and material needs of peoples long suffering under iniquities and hardships. When, in their efforts to better their status, they succeed in satisfying their worldly needs, they do not cease to yearn for the realization of their spiritual goals. To them freedom and independence are such fine goals, such noble ideals, that they work for them more fervently and zealously, and gladly sacrifice their all until their goals are realized. The unfortunate and unhappy Ukrainians are no exception.

These hard-working, liberty-loving, stouthearted, and supremely devout Christians have struggled for their freedom against insuperable odds for centuries. In 1918, when the forces that held them in chains were shattered, they proclaimed their independence and established the Ukrainian Republic. That was on January 22 of that year. From its birth until its agonizing death at the hands of Communist Russians 2 years later, the newly created state was faced with insurmountable difficulties and implacable enemies. The Communists were the most fearful and ferocious among these. Early in 1920 the country was attacked and then overrun by the Red army; soon it was incorporated into the Soviet Union, and the independent Ukraine had ceased to exist. Since those days, for almost four decades, more than 40 million Ukrainians have borne the heavy yoke of the Kremlin and have suffered in a way beyond description. They have been robbed of their worldly possessions, and they have been put to death by the millions. They were driven from their homes to the forbidding vastness of Siberian wasteland, and in slave-labor camps they have been forced to work under most abominable conditions for their heartless taskmasters in the Kremlin. Lenins, Stalins, Vyshinskys, and even Molotovs have come and gone; Khrushchevs, Mikoyans, and others will undoubtedly pass away. But during these years there has been no change in the unenviable lot of unhappy Ukrainians. Contrary to the soothing statements by persons high in the Kremlin's despotic hierarchy, there is no doubt that the Ukrainians are suffering as much under the Soviet totalitarian dictatorship today as they have during the past 4 years.

Today, this January 22, is the 41st anniversary of their independence. The hundreds of thousands who are domiciled in this hospitable Republic and have become loyal American citizens, celebrate that historic event by observing the Ukrainian Independence Day. I am glad to join them in that memorable celebration.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the achievement of freedom—individual liberty and national independence by which nations may, by their own free will, determine their own destiny, elect their own officials, conduct the affairs of their government without any dictation from any alien or predatory power—is a goal which must be and will be fought for till the end of time. For centuries and centuries, many nations, large and small, have fought against predatory powers to sustain their independence and to regain the independence which was taken from them by a superior military power.

Long before the name Russia became known, the people of the nation of Ukraine enjoyed a distinct culture, religion, heritage, language, and all other attributes which contribute to the building of a great nation. This independence was enjoyed until a few years after the Treaty of Peryslav in 1654 by which the Russians, in their usual predatory manner, broke all the agreements of the treaty and subjected the Ukrainian nation to their rule. Throughout these centuries the Ukrainian people have resisted the unwanted domination and control by the Russian despots.

It was during World War I that the tottering Russian czarist empire, appropriately called the Prison of Nations, was seething with discontent and then afforded the opportunity to the Ukrainian nation to declare its own independence and to manage its own affairs. This is the anniversary which we commemorate this month.

The people who are forced to live under the domination of the Kremlin look hopefully to a time of deliverance from restrictive measures which deprive them of their individual liberties and freedom which are considered God-given rights.

Peace will not come until all nations, large and small, are free to determine their own destiny without domination by a foreign power. Peace will come only when the so-called satellite nations such as Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Czechia, Slovakia, Albania, Ukraine, and the other nations held captive by the Russians within the Soviet Union, are free.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, the United States has just played official host to Anastas Mikoyan, probably the second-ranking figure in the Kremlin.

As the official representative of a foreign power, he was received courteously in this country—and that is as it should be.

But there were those who went beyond the bounds of common courtesy and literally fawned over the Soviet visitor.

It behooves me, Mr. Speaker, to remind these individuals that today friends of freedom everywhere are observing the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine.

And remembering and commemorating this event, it should be noted that Ukraine is again a captive nation, enslaved by Mr. Mikoyan's imperialist Moscow.

It should be remembered, too, that this very same Mr. Mikoyan—the same Soviet official who just 2 months ago in a speech before the Moscow City Soviet delivered a violent anti-American address—is the man chiefly responsible for the liquidation of Hungarian patriots.

Nor should it be forgotten that it was Mr. Mikoyan who starved millions of Ukrainians in the manmade famine of the thirties while he shipped grains abroad.

The conscience of the free world should never forget as it observes the 41st anniversary of Ukraine independence that Mr. Mikoyan, a symbol of Soviet hypocrisy, is the spokesman, the front man, the salesman for a regime that talks peace but practices deceit.

Behind the Soviet Union's Iron Curtain—in the oppressed and captive satellite countries—there are millions of people in whose hearts pound the pulse of freedom.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is so tremendously important that in observing the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine we in free America assure the captive nations of our sustaining faith in their eventual liberation, in their ultimate release from enslavement.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, today, the 22d of January, the freedom-loving peoples of the world join in observing the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine.

Today, as a result of the tides of international politics they are submerged in the vast sea of the polyglot Soviet Empire. Except for the short but happy 2-year period of their independence from January 22, 1918, when the free and independent Ukrainian National Republic was formed, until 1920, when its national independence was destroyed by invading Russian Communist armies, they have been suffering under the alien Russian yoke for more than three centuries. The Russians have never, however, been able to eradicate the Ukrainians' nationalist feeling. Ukrainian nationalism is a powerful living force in the country; and despite the fact that it has yielded to brute superior force, their irrepressible free spirit will not be chained. They continue their struggle against the Russian liberalization policies by any and all means. Sabotage on collective farms and in factories, absenteeism, agitation for higher wages, and the present fight for the emancipation of the Ukrainian language in Ukraine are symbolic of their unending fight for freedom from enslavement by the Communists.

The 2 million Ukrainians and their immediate descendants in the free countries outside enslaved Ukraine will continue to work and strive for the liberation of their native country.

I salute these gallant and heroic people of the Ukraine and await the day when their hopes and ambitions will be fully realized.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, much has been said here today by my colleagues in the House, and throughout the free world much thought is being given today as we commemorate the Urkainian Independence Day which falls this January 22.

It is right that we should salute the Ukraine and the Ukrainian people who are captive behind the Iron Curtain. My prayers and good wishes go to them with the hope that they may, before too long, enjoy the blessings of freedom.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, historic Ukraine is the largest country in Eastern Europe, and the Ukrainians are the most numerous of all ethnic groups in that region, numbering more than 40 million. These hardworking and industrious hardy folk of the steppe land, the solid core of the whole East European peasantry, have tilled their fertile soil tirelessly and ceaselessly for centuries, not only for their own well-being, but also for all their neighbors and their cruel taskmasters. The fact that the fair land of Ukraine has almost limitless riches in natural resources seems to have been a prime cause of the misery and misfortune of the Ukrainians. Its wealth and its geographic situation has roused the envy and anger of its powerful neighbors, and has brought about its conquest by alien tyrants.

For some 300 years Ukraine has been submerged in the Russian Continent, and during all that time autocratic czars and tyrannical Communists have done their worst to suppress and eradicate what we in the West regard as the best Ukrainian traits: their desire for freedom, their boundless love for their homeland, their undying yearning for political independence, and their readiness to sacrifice their all for the attainment of their national goal. Only once in the course of three centuries has there been a chance of attaining that goal; that was in 1918. When czarist autocracy was overthrown and Austria no longer ruled over Western Ukraine, Ukrainian leaders seized upon the golden occasion and proclaimed their national independence. That was on January 22, 1918. On that day the Ukrainian Republic came into being, and a new day was ushered in for the Ukrainians.

That day remains a memorable national holiday in the annals of Ukraine. For nearly 300 years Ukrainians had yearned for their freedom, and then they attained that goal only when the czar's autocracy was shattered by revolutionary and world-shaking forces. But the Republic, the Ukrainian Republic, proclaimed to the joy of all lovers of freedom and haters of autocratic tyranny, did not last long. Two years after its birth, early in 1920, it was attacked by powerful Russian Communist forces, overrun by the onrushing Red army, and then it was incorporated into the Soviet Union. Unfortunately for the unhappy Ukrainians to this day their historical homeland remains under the totalitarian dictatorship of Russian Communists. All Ukrainians are fated to suffer under the unrelenting and murderous Soviety tyranny. Not even the last war unloosened their chain of bondage to the Soviet Union. And their unenviable lot under the tyrants of the Kremlin is even worse than it was under the autocratic czars.

In the hope of escaping autocratic and Communist tyrannies hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians fled their homes and sought refuge abroad. Many of them crossed the Atlantic and were welcomed in this hospitable and free Republic. Today we count them among our loyal, patriotic, hardworking citizens. In the celebration of the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day I am glad to join them and echo their fine, freedom-loving and patriotic sentiments.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, 41 years ago, the people of the Ukraine proclaimed their independence. Today, we mark the anniversary of that declaration of freedom. It is, in a sense, a pathetic anniversary, as the Ukraine must live in the repressive climate of the Communist dictatorship. On the other hand, it is fitting that we try to focus the attention of all free peoples on the continuing fidelity to principles of liberty which the overwhelming majority of Ukrainians—at home and abroad—have demonstrated through the years.

In recent days, we have been host to the No. 2 man of the Kremlin. Before we accept his statements at anything approaching face value, let us recall the decades of subjugation and slavery which the spurious enlightenment of the Kremlin has inflicted on the constituent peoples of that forced union of Soviet Socialist pseudorepublics.

Those of us who are not natives of the land mass now encompassed by the map-makers' boundaries of the U.S.S.R.—and are not descended from such natives—can forget too easily that this huge area is not populated entirely by Russians. Ethnically, only 45 percent of the people of the U.S.S.R. can be called Russians. The Ukraine, for example, is not a Russian country. It is the nation of the Ukrainian people, confined within the fictitious voluntary union of communism.

Americans of Ukrainian origin have contributed notably to the industry, culture, and character of our own truly free Republic. As we salute them, then, on the anniversary of the declaration of, unhappily, short-lived independence of their ancestral land, let us resolve again to pursue by example and by all other peaceable means, the worldwide acceptance of the tenets of individual free expression and popular government for which Ukrainians were willing to die in the brief span of their modern independence. Since the dawn of civilization, these precepts have prompted men to battle cruel odds, and the defeats always have been followed by new victories of the free spirit.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, Ukrainians the world over will celebrate January 22, 1959, as the 41st anniversary of the declaration of the independence of the Ukrainian Republic. We in the United States, with the more than a million and a half Ukrainians on this side of the Atlantic, pay tribute to the brave men of that day and this. We take this occasion to honor the Ukraine with its 40 million people now subject to the control of the Soviet Union. They maintain, nevertheless, their identity, their culture, and their ideals, as they have maintained them down the centuries.

For this independence day which we celebrate was not only an event of the utmost importance to the Ukraine in modern times. It was also a great milestone in the unbroken history of a people whose civilization dates back a thousand years. Witness the great city of Kiev with its industry, the hub of rich mineral developments, its educational institutions representative of the superior standards of learning and refinement in Ukrainian developments, its monuments to religion stretching back to antiquity, its opera house—that alone unsullied even by the German invasion in World War II—this city surrounded by agricultural fields well cared for by industrious, persevering people, and famed for abundance and for furnishing a large percentage of Russia's food and exports. Typical of the progressiveness of the Ukrainian people are their innovations in agriculture, their discoveries in mineral resources, their building of the massive dam across the mighty Dnieper, one of the great waterways of Europe.

The Ukrainian people have maintained their outstanding characteristics, their individuality, despite centuries of political hardship. Their brief interlude of the independence which we celebrate—lasting only a few years—was but an interval in centuries of onslaught from east and west, by enemies envious of their wealth, their stamina, and their unswerving personality. For despite constant efforts from without at subjugation, the Ukrainian people have refused to bow in spirit. Their love of liberty, their determination to maintain their freedom of person, in spite of adverse circumstances, has been characteristic of these people we honor today.

That independence of spirit, so dear to the heart of all Americans, awakens a sympathetic and enthusiastic response among us. We join with the Ukrainians everywhere in a tribute to the independence day which they are celebrating.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, as the power of Muscovy developed and expanded, the Russians came to overwhelm the Ukraine principality and, until 1917, the Ukraine people languished under the czars' tyrannical government. In that year, with the collapse of the czarist regime at the time of the Russian revolutions, the Ukrainians gained control of their own destiny once again. Unhappily, their independence was short lived. They were able to stand up as free people for only 2 years. Once again the forces of Muscovy, this time carrying the banner of Communist tyranny, overwhelmed them and their hard-won independence was lost. Since then they have suffered great loss as the Soviets have attempted to weld them into the ironbound Communist empire.

The Ukrainians are hard working, energetic, and determined people. Those who live in the United States demonstrate these qualities before their American compatriots every day. The opportunities they receive in this country they earn by the contribution they make toward our national life. Therefore, on this 41st anniversary, I am happy to greet the Ukrainian people.

I am particularly proud of the industrious spirit of those Americans of Ukrainian descent in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois. There is hardly a section of my district where the great contributions of these gallant people are not indelibly imprinted. I might even add, Mr. Speaker, that my immediate neighbor in Chicago is of Ukrainian descent. Mrs. Mary Krevensky has been the very symbol of a very noble people and an inspiration to the rest of the neighbors in my immediate community.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the day will soon come when the Ukrainian people, along with all those other wonderful people in central Europe now living under Communist slavery, will be able to again see the rays of freedom and pursue their rich, cultural heritage as free men and women.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, the day upon which is celebrated the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian national independence, many patriotic and freedom-loving Americans gather together to commemorate, in open discussion, the sad plight of the Ukrainian nation—it keeps alive the cause of individual liberty and reinvigorates the flame of freedom in thousands of imprisoned souls of the captive Ukrainian people.

Ukrainia, a traditionally democratic nation, a tiny republic whose people cherish the fundamental principles of liberty and have never given up the struggle to recapture their freedom from Soviet domination.

The blue-and-gold-colored flag of the Ukrainian nation unfurls itself in many towns and cities of our great land, this day, as a symbol of protest to the Soviet Union for its enslavement of the Ukrainian people.

It is never too late nor too long to recognize the historic claim of Ukrainia as an independent nation of the free world.

We must, in our foreign policy, bring about the dissolution of colonial domination imposed by the Soviet Union over the freedom-loving captured nations of the world. There can be no permanent peace among the nations of the world without freedom.

The United States of America, the youngest of the great nations of the world, enjoying spiritual and economic freedom, must keep other nations free, in order to safeguard its own existence and the great democratic institutions protecting its way of life.

We owe it to the Ukrainian people—they must be free.

Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Speaker, Thursday, January 22, marks the 41st anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine.

Friends of Ukrainians throughout the world are remembering this date and I am honored and privileged to add my voice in commemoration of it.

The Ukraine is the largest non-Russian nation behind the Iron Curtain and one wherein the spirit of freedom lives in the hearts of 40 million Ukrainians.

The Ukrainian proclamation of independence took place on January 22, 1918, after centuries of oppression and foreign domination. It is sad to recall that the joyous event of independence was so short lived and that the fine and courageous Ukrainian nation was overrun and crushed by the oppressive forces of communism.

We in America, who have been so fortunate to enjoy the precious fruits of liberty, cannot help but have our hearts saddened at the spectacle of tyranny which prevails in the Ukraine.

We respect and admire the Ukrainian nation and its people who have continued in their steadfast resolve to attain their freedom and independence and who have stood as a shining example, for us the fortunate, of the eternal dignity of man and of his desire to be free.

We can take courage that the spirit of the Ukrainian nation and its people will eventually prevail and that the Ukraine will again be a free and independent nation. I know that all Americans join with me in saluting these brave people and extending to them our friendship and encouragement.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, friends of freedom everywhere will be observing today the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. In the profound faith that Moscow's deceitful campaign of "smiles and trade" could never cause us to forget the aspirations of the captive nations and their fundamental importance to the security of our Nation, and with the hope of helping to keep the spirit of freedom alive in the hearts of 40 million Ukrainians, I join in their celebration. I hope, too, that these words will serve notice of my sustained faith in the eventual liberation of all nations enslaved by imperialist Moscow. They should also demonstrate to the Menshikovs, Mikoyans, and Khrushchevs that American memories of their crimes and our standards of civilized decency and justice cannot be erased by their calculated genteel antics or by spurious promises of trade.

The reception given Mr. Mikoyan by some of our wealthy Americans is food for serious thought. It indicates the spiritual climate in some quarters. Twenty years ago, the Nazi Dr. Hjalmar Schacht was completely ignored for what he represented. Today, despite his personal crimes, the Armenian quisling is widely feted. The thousands of patriotic Armenians, Azerbaijani, Don and Kuban Cossacks who were annihilated by his orders in 1917–21; the millions of Ukrainians who starved to death in the manmade famine of the thirties while Mikoyan shipped grains abroad; the role he played in the liquidation of Hungarian patriots—these and other facts no longer seem to bestir the consciences of some of us. Only 2 months ago, before the Moscow City Soviet, Mikoyan delivered a violent anti-American speech; today, without self-respect, some accept him as a deliverer of peace.

I wish to pay my respects today to the many Ukrainians of American descent for keeping high their hopes and aspirations for the restoration of freedom and independence to the land of the birth of their forefathers, and to assure them that all true Americans are solidly behind them in their endeavors.

Mr. LIPSCOMB. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, January 22, friends of freedom everywhere will be observing the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine.

On January 22, 1918, the Ukraine declared itself an independent republic. This was literally the first time since the 17th century that this land and its people had known freedom.

Their liberty, alas, was short lived. In 1920 the Ukrainian Republic was destroyed by the Red army and it has borne the brutalizing tyranny of the Russian Bear ever since.

It is difficult, if not virtually impossible for us in this country to have a realistic conception of what this means. Much is said of America taking her freedom and her way of life for granted. I believe that this is less so today than ever before because of the never-ending peril of communism. Nevertheless, the awareness of an enemy, and understanding the reality of living under that enemy's political system, are two entirely different things. It is partially for this reason that I call to your attention this 41st anniversary of Ukrainian independence. We cannot know what the Ukrainian people have lived through. It is my sincere hope that we will never have this knowledge. We can, however, take this moment to pay tribute to a subject people who have been terrorized without letup for almost 40 years. The Ukrainian people obviously have not sunk into servile apathy. The Soviet Union has been forced to maintain its rule by force. The intangible quest for liberty—for the freedom of mind and action—never dies. It is the Russian knowledge of this truth that demands their rule by terror as the only way of dominating their subject peoples. Herein lies the tragedy of the Ukraine. Those two free years from 1918 to 1920 cannot be wiped from memory.

Today then, I wish to express my awareness and appreciation of the spirit of the Ukraine, January 22, 1918. I am aware and appreciative, because it is also the Spirit of 1776.

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 41st anniversary of the declaration of Ukrainian independence and on this solemn occasion I wish to pay tribute to the courageous and freedom-loving people of the Ukraine.

To these brave people who have kept alive the spirit of freedom and independence through long enslavement and oppression by the cruel and unrelenting Russian Communists, we in America offer our deep and enduring friendship.

Like them, we look forward to the day when the Ukraine once again will become an independent nation, free of the Russian Communist yoke and free of the indignities and cruelties that have been their lot under domination by the savages of the Kremlin.

The desire and love of freedom of the people of the Ukraine cannot be ignored and must not be denied, even though the road to its achievement is a long and hard one. We and all other God-fearing peoples cherish with the people of the Ukraine the significance of this proudly remembered anniversary day and we join in looking ahead to that future date when Ukrainian independence shall live again in reality, as it lives today in the hearts of the Ukrainian people.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, Thursday marks the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. We are all likely to forget the history of the individual countries which are now involuntarily held in the U.S.S.R. The independence which was declared by the Ukrainians in 1918 was short lived. The new Bolshevik Russia wrenched freedom from the militarily weak Ukrainians only 3 years after it had been proclaimed. The Ukraine harbors a hate for Communist oppression as great in fervor as their love of freedom. It is the hope of all free men that the taste of freedom which was so fleeting in their mouths will serve to whet their appetite for liberty. The Communists can prohibit public demonstrations, but nothing can suppress the patriotism which lives on in every Ukrainian heart.

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I join with the many friends of freedom who are paying tribute to the brave Ukrainians on their 41st anniversary of their independence.

After years of oppression, they were able to throw off the yoke of Russian rule. Despite Russian attempts to wipe out Ukrainian nationalism, their love of freedom and high ideals prevailed, and when, in 1918, they regained their independence, they proclaimed the Ukrainian Republic. They adopted a democratic form of government, and, with vigor, courage, and hopeful hearts, they began to rebuild their war-torn country. Their liberty was short lived, for in 2 years the Russian Communists, by dint of their tremendous forces, again annexed the new Republic to the Soviet Union. Ever since 40 million Ukrainians have been bowed under Soviet rule in captive state; the freedom for which they sacrificed so much has been lost.

It is well that we commemorate the independence and freedom of the Ukrainian National Republic; the people of the Ukraine are not allowed to recall the great day or celebrate by any outward sign. We who cherish liberty and democratic ideals can express our sympathy over their loss and also convey our good wishes that the day will come when their prayers will be answered and their and our hopes fulfilled—the day when a free and independent Ukrainian National Republic is again established.

We commend the Ukrainians now in our country for the splendid contributions they have made to our Nation in the fields of culture, science, and industry, as well as for their participation in our Government as splendid citizens.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of independence by the Ukrainian National Republic. It is fitting that we join with Americans of Ukrainian ancestry, and with freedom-loving peoples everywhere, in commemorating this important date, and in expressing our deepest sympathy for the present plight of the Ukrainian people.

When the sovereignty and independence of the Ukrainian National Republic was crushed in 1920, the Ukrainian National Republic was one of the first victims of Communist expansion and aggression. Throughout the long years of enslavement, the people of Ukraine have kept alive a spirit of freedom and have preserved their strong national feelings.

Man and his sustained faith in eventual liberation are the most vital and potent weapons against communism. The human desire for freedom will survive all hardship, and will outlast the effect of any technological or scientific weapons. We must not forget this basic truth.

The brave people of Ukraine must be encouraged to continue their undaunted determination to regain independent national status. We must again pledge ourselves to the goal that we shall build a better world in which all nations may live in peace, freedom, and justice. We will work toward this end, and trust that our determination to do this will bring added courage to the people of the Ukraine and the peoples of other Communist-dominated nations.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, the day the people of America forget the sacrifices and sufferings of people throughout the world who value freedom enough to die for it—that day we shall have forfeited our birthright of liberty.

Happily, that day is not near. And fortunately, we are plentifully supplied with opportunities to remind ourselves that freedom is worth fighting for—opportunities like the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian independence which we commemorate here on January 22.

The national independence of the Ukrainian people—a goal they passionately pursued for hundreds of years—was won on January 22, 1918, with the formation of the Ukrainian National Republic.

But independence for these brave people was destined to be brief. In 1920, invading Communist armies from Russia overran the proud and fertile land and absorbed the country as a part of the new Soviet state.

Thus, the Ukrainian people became the first in a long series of victims of Communist terror, oppression, and slavery. Virtually every form of persecution has been used to kill the instincts of freedom in the breasts of Ukrainian patriots: starvation, murder, imprisonment, religious, and ethnic genocide, and slave labor.

The overwhelming force of the totalitarian state has succeeded in keeping the Ukrainian nation enslaved. But this brutality has not succeeded in killing the Ukrainian people's undying devotion to freedom. We have seen it happen so often—in Russia, Germany, Hungary—that whenever the struggle against Communist oppression breaks into the open we can be certain that Ukrainians are playing a prominent role.

This ceaseless fight for the freedom of their homeland is supported, at least in spirit, wherever Ukrainian people have settled throughout the world. To a large degree, it has been because the Ukrainian people, and others with first-hand experience, wherever they may be, have insisted on raising their voices and telling the world of Russian brutality that the free world has remained alert to the menace of Soviet communism.

Freedom-loving Americans owe a great debt of gratitude to those of our fellow citizens who have cared so strongly.

Because Union County, N.J., has a relatively large proportion of people of Ukrainian descent among its population, I know personally of their deep feeling for freedom. It has been a major element in their success as active, public-spirited American citizens, and a contribution we must always cherish.

Let us, therefore, rededicate ourselves at this time—especially those of us who carry the responsibilities of representatives of the people in Congress—to the ancient principles of personal freedom and national independence. Let us strengthen our resolve to fight oppression, to oppose brutality, to stand steadfastly against all the relentless pressures of Communist totalitarianism.

Let us, that is, absorb the spirit and courage of those Ukrainians who have loved freedom so truly that they have died for it.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the anniversary of Ukrainian independence. Forty-one years ago the Ukrainian people proclaimed their independence for the first time after centuries of oppression and foreign domination. Unfortunately, their freedom was short lived, and for that reason we commemorate this date with sadness and sympathy for the plight of these courageous people, today the victims of Communist expansion and aggression.

This anniversary should serve as a reminder of the fateful enslavement of 40 million Ukrainians by Soviet communism, and we should pledge anew our efforts and hopes for the day when once again there will be a free and independent Ukrainian National Republic.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the Ukraine, an ancient and proud people, is the largest country in Eastern Europe, and the Ukrainians are the most numerous of all ethnic groups in that region, numbering more than 40 million. In many ways it is the most productive agricultural region of Eastern Europe, and has often been referred to as the breadbasket of the area. Its hardworking inhabitants, the solid core of the whole Eastern Europe's peasantry, have tilled their fertile soil tirelessly and ceaselessly, not only for their own well-being but also for their neighbors' and recently for their heartless Soviet taskmasters'. The very fact that the fair land of the Ukraine is fertile and rich in natural resources seems to have been a cause of the misery and misfortune of the Ukrainians. The wealth of the land has roused the envy and anger of its powerful and power-hungry neighbors, and that has occasioned its conquest by alien tyrants.

For more than 300 years the Ukraine has been submerged in the Russian continent, and during all that time autocratic czars and Communists have done their worst to suppress and eradicate what we in the West regard as the best Ukrainian national traits: their desire for freedom, their boundless love for their homeland, their undying yearning for political independence, and their readiness to sacrifice their all for the attainment of their national goal. Only once in the course of their long subjugation to alien rulers they had the chance of attaining that goal; that was in 1918. When the czar's autocracy was overthrown and Austria no longer ruled over Western Ukraine, Ukrainian leaders seized the occasion and proclaimed their national independence. That was on January 22, 1918, the day on which the Ukrainian National Republic came into being, and a new day was ushered in for the Ukrainians.

That day is a landmark in the recent history of the Ukraine, and remains as a bright moment in the struggle of the Ukrainians for their national independence. The unfortunate Ukrainians enjoyed their hard-won freedom for only a short time. Since that day innumerable events have cast a dark cloud over the Ukraine. The newly proclaimed and created Ukrainian Republic did not last long. Being surrounded by enemies, its days were numbered, and its end seemed near. Early in 1920 Communist Russians treacherously attacked and overran the country; then it was incorporated into the Soviet Union. That was the end of independent Ukraine.

To this day, the Ukraine remains a province of the Soviet Empire, and, of course, Ukrainians there are fated to suffer under the Soviet tyranny. For almost 40 years more than 40 million liberty-loving Ukrainians have been living in a large prison camp in their historic homeland, surrounded by Soviet secret agents and separated from the free world by the Iron Curtain. Of course, they do not enjoy any of the freedoms which in the West we regard as our birthright. Under such trying conditions they are not permitted to celebrate their independence day. Fortunately, however, hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians who live in the free world celebrate it, and Ukrainian-Americans solemnly observe this memorable day in their worthy effort to keep alive the spirit of an independent Ukraine. I am, indeed, glad to join in the 41st anniversary celebration of the Ukrainian Independence Day.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

BUDGET FOR VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION, 1959

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to study and evaluate the budget for the Veterans' Administration, but I have been greatly distressed at some of the implications in that budget which I think are very far reaching, insofar as hospitals are concerned, as far as taking away benefits which have been given in the past, and which will be removed in the future, and other provisions of the budget.

I am deeply troubled because I understand that 37,000 veterans have had their service connection severed as the result of a review of claims and cases in the past year.

It is a horrible thing, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me we are forgetting the men who fought and died and who are wounded and sick as a result of their bringing freedom not only to this country but to many other countries.

I hope that all Members will join with me in making a complete study and evaluation of the budget for the Veterans' Administration and the severance of claims. Have the Members ever ascertained how much it costs the taxpayers to send these many investigators to the Veterans' Administration from various departments.

The Veterans' Administration offices have had men looking over the shoulders of men who were doing the work on the Veterans' Administration. Now I understand they are to have another group of another department going over their work. The VA offices have policemen at their elbows all the time. It is a very trying and unwarranted situation to have group after group after group going in and instead of suggesting improvements for the veterans, they are suggesting benefits and services to take away—taking away their hospitalization, their compensation, and doing them a great deal of damage altogether.

RECOGNITION OF THE RIGHTS OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY OWNERS HELPFUL TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill H.R. 3126 which would amend section 1371 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to require that stock of a small business corporation in the form of community property of husband and wife shall be treated as owned by one shareholder for the purposes of determining the number of shareholders of such small business corporations.

It is recalled that in an effort to stimulate and assist small business, the 85th Congress enacted into law provisions for small business tax adjustments. Those provisions were incorporated in Public Law 85–866. Section 64 of that law gave small business corporations the opportunity to elect to be taxed as partnerships. The income of the corporations would under such elections be taxed to the shareholders. The law provided that in order to qualify as a small business corporation for the benefits under such election there could be no more than 10 shareholders.

On November 26, 1958, the Treasury took the position that in community property States the spouse of a shareholder must also be counted as a shareholder for the purposes of the Small Business Tax Adjustment Act. That position was announced in the Internal Revenue's Service Technical Information Release, No. 113, dated November 26, 1958. If left unchanged, it would have the effect of reducing to the limit of five the number of married men in community property States who could as owners of a small busines corporation take advantage of the small business tax benefit to which I have referred. In other situations involving community property, 10 men owning shares in a small business corporation, even though they are married, may get the small business tax benefits to which I have made reference. It is obvious that Congress never intended such inequitable results.

The bill I am introducing today would remedy this situation. It would add a new subsection to section 1371 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 which would provide, that for the purpose of determining whether a corporation has 10 or less shareholders, stock which is community property, or is owned jointly by husband and wife, and which is managed and controlled by only one of the spouses, shall be treated as owned by one shareholder for the purposes of the mentioned provision in the Small Business Tax Adjustment Act of 1958; namely, section 1371 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 as amended.

It should be explained that section 1372(a) of the Internal Revenue Code requires the consent of all shareholders of a small business corporation to the election to be taxed as a partnership and also requires that a person who becomes a shareholder after the election is made must also consent to the election. My bill would not affect that aspect of the matter. I feel that explanation is necessary because when we had the small business tax adjustment provisions under consideration in the 85th Congress, we felt that a constitutional question would be raised if we should tax the income of a corporation to the shareholders of the corporation without the consent of all such shareholders so taxed. For that reason section 1372(a) requires the consent of all shareholders to the election and also requires that any person who becomes a shareholder after the election is made must also consent. If the new shareholder does not give consent, the election is terminated.

Inasmuch as stock which is the community property of a husband and wife, or which is held by joint tenancy by a husband and wife in a common law State, is under applicable State law owned by each spouse in an undivided one-half interest, it is my view that making either spouse subject to Federal income tax on a portion of the corporation's income without the consent of such spouse would raise the same constitutional question which the law as now written tried to avoid. Therefore, my bill also avoids that problem.

WHY THE DRIVE FOR CONSUMER CREDIT CONTROLS IS OUT OF ORDER

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, as many of the Members know, there has been a drive on for several years now for legislation which would give the Federal Reserve System authority to put specific and direct controls on consumer credit. More specifically, the proposal being urged is for standby controls which would allow the Federal Reserve to issue regulations specifying minimum down-payments and maximum loan or payment periods for consumer goods bought on time. In other words, the proposal is to enact peacetime authority similar to the old regulation W which was in effect during the war and postwar period.

Recently the New York Journal of Commerce carried a feature editorial on this proposal, remarking on some of the strange aspects of the drive which is being waged to put it across. It observes, correctly, that this drive has been persistent since 1955, and that it has been mostly under cover. It seems to me, furthermore, that the campaign for this legislation is now being stepped up; the proposal is being pushed with more urgency.

This proposal seems also to have considerable appeal to Members who are quite seriously concerned about the inflation problem and are seeking better safeguards against inflation. Perhaps it is not without some merit.

Several aspects of the proposal are, however, being generally overlooked. Certainly the proposal is being presented in a distorted perspective.

The Journal of Commerce editorial to which I have referred made a number of good arguments both for and against consumer credit controls. But it overlooked what seems to me the more important considerations, and I believe these are being generally overlooked. Consequently, I wrote the editor calling attention to these considerations, which letter the Journal of Commerce published this morning.

Since I know that many of the Members are interested in this question of standby controls on consumer credit, I might invite their attention to the considerations, as I see them, which this proposal raises. My letter of January 12 follows, as it appeared in the Journal of Commerce this morning:

PATMAN OUTLINES VIEWS—MODERNIZATION OF CREDIT CONTROLS URGED

To the EDITOR of THE JOURNAL OF COMMERCE:

Your editorial of January 8 on standby consumer credit controls makes some good points. However, the arguments you give are heavily weighted in favor of such legislation, even though you end up saying you dislike such controls and would like to see Congress drop the whole matter at this time.

Thus you place me in opposition to legislation which you paint as good—if indeed, you do not paint me as a reason why good legislation becomes bad. You say I have served notice I will ask for maximum interest rates on consumer credit—if Congress considers giving the Federal Reserve authority to fix minimum down payments and maximum loan periods—and then you add "that should kill the whole project and certainly disillusion the conservative element in Congress."

REVIEW HELD NEEDED

My position has been that our whole system of money and credit controls is badly in need of review and modernization. These controls are grossly inadequate to the burden which has been placed on them in recent years, and they are 40 years out of date even as minimum instruments for economic stability. But why single out consumer credit?

This drive for consumer credit controls is very strange. As your editorial points out, the drive has been persistent since 1955 and mostly undercover. Let's try to put it in perspective.

To find anything to illustrate a practical need for consumer credit controls, the sponsors of this proposal have to go back to the boom in auto sales in 1955. This provides extremely shadowy support. Auto sales in that year are reasoned to have been too high, only because in later years they have been much lower.

The need for controls over business credit has been much clearer, and much more recent. But the drive for consumer credit controls has not been broadened to include business credit controls, standby or otherwise.

OBJECT OF TIGHT MONEY

Chairman Martin and other Federal Reserve officials have repeatedly stated that the object of the tight-money squeeze of 1956–57 was not consumer buying but the boom in business investment—specifically investment in new capital equipment. Here, then, is a situation which the Federal Reserve definitely feels to have been inflationary, and so seriously so that it went after it with its blunderbuss instruments of tight money, and brought on a general depression before its target got hit.

It had no authority to restrain the borrowers that were engaged in the runaway expansion; namely the big industrial corporations. And it had no authority to restrain the lenders who were supplying most of the credit, namely, the insurance companies, investment trusts, and other nonbank lenders. At no time, however, did the sponsors of credit controls suggest controls of the kind that were needed.

Certainly no one would argue now that the Federal Reserve's indirect means—squeezing bank credit—have proved successful in reaching a big business investment boom.

Between October of 1955 and October of 1957 bank loans to corporations having more than $100 million of assets increased by 66 percent, while bank loans to firms with less than $50,000 of assets dropped 3 percent, which is only added evidence that the Federal Reserve was more successful in squeezing small firms out of the credit necessary for carrying on their previous levels of operation than it was in checking big business expansionist programs. Still there is no proposal for credit controls to check an investment boom.

PRICE HIKES FOR EXPANSION

Coming to a more important source of inflation in the 1956–57 boom, many of the big business industries raised prices to obtain some of the funds for plant expansion—at least they announced this as the reason for raising prices. There are no controls for restraining this source of inflation, and there is no drive from the business and financial community for such controls.

Consider also the fact that business inventories are regarded as one of the most troublesome eccentric wheels in the economic system, and that inventory booms are a least justifiable source of inflation. There is no proposal for standby controls over credit to finance inventory booms.

Finally, the consumer credit controls which are being proposed could be used only to dampen consumer buying at times when such buying is thought to be too high. The most serious and continuous practical problem is to stimulate consumer buying at times when it is too low.

But there is no proposal for the consumer controls necessary for this, namely, for reducing excessive finance charges. The recent findings of the Supreme Court of Kansas that one of the country's largest finance companies has been charging consumers 72 percent a year to finance auto purchases hardly suggests that the present usury laws are adequate to uphold traditional standards of morality, to say nothing of preventing demand for consumer durables being dissipated in excessive interest charges.

PURPOSE OF DRIVE

Under the circumstances I have recited, the drive for consumer credit controls hardly seems to have price stability as its purpose. It begins to look like the drive of the early 1930's which ended in legislation forbidding the banks to pay depositors interest on demand deposits.

What could not be done privately, in the face of incomplete restraints on competition, was done by legislation. In any case, it seems to me that if Congress should pass legislation which will reduce the risk in consumer loans, Congress should also include provisions to reduce the interest charges on such loans.

If it is proper to legislate to protect lenders against a wholesale default on consumer credit, it is equally proper to protect consumers against exorbitant finance charges.

If the time ever comes when consumer credit controls are actually needed, Congress can act quickly enough. In the meantime, proposals for such controls, even on a standby basis, can wait along with the other credit controls that are more urgently needed.

WRIGHT PATMAN.

With reference to the point that only standby controls are being proposed the Journal of Commerce has remarked that once such controls were available there would be a temptation to use them. It could be added that once the Federal Reserve had authority to invoke these controls, there would be terrific pressures from the bankers and finance companies for invoking them. Furthermore, we could expect that after such controls had been in effect for a while, a notion would come to be accepted that certain minimum standards of risk in consumer paper should be observed at all times, and that the regulations should always be in effect, at least to these minimums.

The editorial appearing in the Journal of Commerce on January 8, which prompted my letter, is as follows:

STAND BY FOR WHAT?

Legislation giving the Federal Reserve Board standby authority to regulate consumer installment credit terms is bound to be put into the legislative hopper again at an early date.

Not only will Senator PRESCOTT BUSH, Republican of Connecticut, reintroduce his standby authority bill that failed to get anywhere during the past session of Congress but some other legislators will introduce a number of new wrinkles or gimmicks in the field of installment credit control.

Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Democrat, of Texas, has already served notice that he will ask for the establishment of maximum interest rates for installment credit contracts in case the reimposition of minimum downpayment and maximum maturity requirements is proposed. That should kill the whole project and certainly disillusion the conservative element in Congress.

It is always risky to predict the fate of any particular piece of legislation at the start of a new session of Congress. That is particularly true when a controversial issue develops well before the legislative battlelines can be formed.

The regulation or control of installment credit is such an issue. Ever since the record expansion in installment credit during the 1955 boom, a persistent (mostly undercover) drive has been on to prevent a reappearance of that pattern by giving the Federal Reserve Board standby controls over such credit.

The Federal Reserve Board actually had a five-volume study of this issue prepared which, after a tremendous amount of labor, produced only inconclusive results. At any rate, since installment credit was no longer an acute problem by the time the study was finished, the Federal Reserve Board at that time did not propose any form of regulation, not even standby controls.

That seemed to be final—but was it really?

In the last 2 months installment credit volume has picked up once again, largely because of its higher use in automobile buying during November. Nevertheless, the total amount outstanding at the end of November was still nearly $500 million below a year ago.

And yet a new sense of urgency has already been introduced into the discussion of the issue of installment credit control.

This obviously is not due to a change in the market conditions or to any alarming pickup in credit demand; the new drive seems more in the nature of preventive medicine. Those arguing for the reimposition of such controls frankly admit that there is no urgency for such a step now but then add that the mere existence of standby controls certainly could not do any harm and might do some good.

This could be true only if they actually believe that even the imposition of positive controls would do no harm under any circumstance. But such reasoning is apt to be faulty, inasmuch as past experience has demonstrated repeatedly that the mere existence of standby controls constitutes a strong temptation to impose them.

The basic issue then is between the desirability or necessity of actual controls and prospects for the development of conditions under which such controls might conceivably become desirable.

If anything approaching an inflationary breakthrough in the demand for credit of all major types should develop, the situation would be different.

The Federal Reserve Board, as is well known, has really never abandoned its fears of inflation. Even during the recent recession it kept its fingers crossed. The remarkably fast recovery since last June once again has sharpened the Federal Reserve watch against an inflationist speedup in the recovery. It can hardly come as a surprise that the Board today is reexamining its initial opposition to even standby installment credit controls. A number of reports have come out of Washington of late to the effect that at least some members of the Board are busy mending their fences on the issue of installment credit regulation in order to be prepared for a quick turnabout in case a sharp increase in the use of this type of credit becomes apparent.

Thus far, no such situation seems imminent. Hence, this newspaper does not see any reason to change its attitude on installment credit standby controls. We still dislike such standby controls and would like to see Congress drop the whole matter at this time.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Hail Columbian Lawyers

OF
HON. ALFRED E. SANTANGELO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, January 21, 1958, was a historic day in the annals of the legal profession of New York. Fifty-three members of the Columbian Lawyers Association were admitted to the U.S. Supreme Court. Two of them were women.

The Columbian Lawyers Association is a young bar association operating in the first judicial department of the State of New York. Its membership consists of more than 500 lawyers and is composed of lawyers of Italian origin who practice principally in the city of New York. Many of them are leaders in their respective communities. They are guardians of our traditions and the architects of our future.

This organization has among its aims the maintenance of a high standard of conduct for the legal profession and the selection of capable and learned judges to serve in our courts. They believe that in order to realize the American goal of equal justice before the law, lawyers must be skilled advocates with high standards of conduct and justices of courts must be learned and experienced.

I had the high honor and privilege of sponsoring 28 of these members for admission to the U.S. Supreme Court. My former associate in the New York County district attorney's office, now a justice of the domestic relations court, Louis A. Pagnucco, sponsored the admission of the other 25 Columbian members.

I was not surprised to note that Judge Louis Pagnucco, who guided and coached me when I was a fledgling assistant district attorney in the office of Frank Hogan, still befriends and guides other attorneys in their aspirations and endeavors. It was a pleasure for me once again to be with my dear friend, Judge Pagnucco, who was one of the greatest assistant district attorneys in the homicide bureau during the administration of District Attorneys Thomas E. Dewey and Frank S. Hogan. Judge Pagnucco, who possesses a doctorate of laws, is not only a brilliant lawyer and judge but also has the unusual talent of speaking seven languages fluently.

This journey to Washington was the realization of a dream of Thomas Cartelli, the first president of the Columbian Lawyers Association. Much planning and work was done to transport 53 active lawyers to Washington from the city of New York to house them and to prepare a program. Great credit goes to Mr. Cartelli and Sylvester Cosentino, the second president of this vigorous bar association.

Prior to being sworn in by Chief Justice Earl Warren, this bar group had the distinct privilege of meeting with Associate Justice Tom C. Clark at a private hearing. Justice Clark renewed old acquaintances with some of the candidates. One of them, Arthur R. Martoccia, served as a U.S. assistant when Justice Clark was U.S. attorney.

Justice Clark addressed the candidates and enlightened them as to the workings and practices of the members of the court in arriving at a determination of an appeal before the Highest Court. As a consequence, the Columbian group can understand events which would otherwise have been mysteries.

One newly admitted member of the group was August Massa, who despite his complete blindness, is an active and successful barrister. Mr. Massa was a classmate of Justice William Douglas at Columbia Law School in the early twenties. It was a thrill to see Justice Douglas greet his blind classmate. They had not met each other in over 30 years.

My colleagues, JOHN J. ROONEY, Democratic Representative, of New York, and ROBERT W. HEMPHILL, Democrat, of South Carolina, were present at the Supreme Court to witness this historic occasion and to lend their moral support.

After the admission to the Supreme Court, the Columbian Lawyers had luncheon at the Congressional Hotel. Several Members of Congress attended the luncheon. Representative VICTOR L. ANFUSO, of Brooklyn; PAUL A. FINO, of the Bronx; JOHN J. ROONEY, of Brooklyn; JOHN DENT, of Pennsylvania; GEORGE P. MILLER, of California; ROLAND LIBONATI, of Chicago; ROBERT GIAIMO, of Connecticut; and I, ALFRED SANTANGELO, addressed the group pointing out the significance of their membership in the U.S. Supreme Court and the pride that we felt in this legal demonstration. Senator JOHN O. PASTORE, of Rhode Island, sent greetings.

On the evening prior to their swearing in, Mr. Gaspar Morell, a successful Washington builder, formerly of New York, held a reception for the Columbian Lawyers at his beautiful home on Kalorama Road on Embassy Row. His Excellency, Manlio Brosio, the Italian Ambassador, was an honored guest. He was accompanied by Dr. Paolo Savina, labor counselor of the Italian Embassy. Also greeting the lawyers was Commissioner Joseph Minetti. I cannot express fully the appreciation I and the Columbian Lawyers feel for the hospitality of Mr. Gaspar Morell and his lovely wife, Anita Morell.

The roll of the newly admitted members to the Supreme Court is as follows: Andrew A. Adinolfi, Italo Henry Ablondi, Pasquale J. Amico, Anthony J. Cannistraci, Joseph Captain, Vito A. Cardo, Thomas Cartelli, Vincent S. Conti, John Copertino, Sylvester Cosentino, Gennaro L. Crispino, Joseph F. Cuccia, Mario J. Cusati, Alexander A. Delle Cese, Leonard P. DeNatale, Joseph F. Periconi, Vincent John deRosa, Vincent J. DiStefano, Anthony J. Edwards, Angelo C. Ninivaggio, Adolph C. Orlando, Edward Papantonio, Christopher L. Ribaudo, Henry D. Sforza, Frank C. Termini, Joseph J. Verdicchio, Miss Theresa E. DiCrocco, Lawrence N. Fariello, Miss Josephine Ferro, Joseph F. Fichera, Joseph W. Genzardi, Joseph N. Giamboi, Vincent A. Giaquinto, Michael A. Greco, Philip A. Greco, Nicholas P. Iannuzzi, Michael W. LaPenna, Salvatore A. Locurto, Richard D. Magro, Arthur R. Martoccia, Augustine F. Massa, Michael F. Mazzola, Anthony J. Mercorella, Mario Merola, Alexander Minella, Ferdinand J. Mondello, Richard J. Nardi, Louis C. Palella, Lino J. Pietrantoni, Joseph A. Robustelli, Thomas A. Signorelli, Vincent J. Velella, Frank J. Zeccola, and Ray V. Manfredi.

The president of the organization is Ferdinand J. Mondello.

Now that these lawyers have returned home to New York, leaving Washington richer because of their visit, I say to them, "Congratulations and Hail Columbia."

Stop the Use of U.S. Mail To Spread Hatred

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, on January 7, the opening day of the 86th Congress, I introduced a bill calling for the most severe penalties for anyone bombing or attempting to bomb a house of worship, a school, or other public building. Closely associated with the recent wave of bomb terrorism is the dissemination of hate material through the U.S. mails which is a major factor in stirring up race hatred and inciting acts of lawlessness.

I am, therefore, now introducing two more bills which are intended as companion measures to my earlier bill to outlaw bombings. One of these measures seeks to amend title 18 of the United States Code to prohibit the transmission through the mails of communications which are intended to incite hatred on account of race, creed, color, religion, or national origin. A fine of $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 1 year, or both, is prescribed in this bill for anyone who knowingly uses the U.S. mails for delivery of cards, pamphlets, circulars, books, or other matter wihch is regarded as nonmailable under this act.

The other bill is very similar in language, except that it prescribes that material which is intended to incite racial or religious hostility shall not be conveyed in the mails, and shall be withdrawn from the mails under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall prescribe. In other words, this bill is intended to give the Postmaster General the authority to withdraw such matter from the mails or refuse to convey it, while the first bill makes it unlawful to mail such matter and prescribes a fine.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear that my bills are not intended to hurt basic American freedoms, especially freedom of the press and freedom of expression. They are intended primarily and solely to strike against the peddlers of racial and religious hatred, the crackpots and the lunatic fringe who are spreading poison against various segments of our people, without realizing how they themselves by their own vicious tactics are undermining American democracy, our way of life, our free institutions, and our religious faiths which are the strongest bulwarks and the most powerful influence in the struggle against communism.

The purpose of these hate sheets which are flooding the country is only to foment trouble and to arouse hatred of Negroes, Jews, Catholics, foreigners, and others. We live in a crucial era when unity of the American people is the crying need of the hour in order to be able to cope with a godless enemy who seeks to destroy us. At such a tragic period in human history, these irresponsible rabble rousers are playing right into the hands of the Communists by spreading dissension, mistrust, and hatred in our own ranks.

Our laws forbid the distribution of seditious literature through the mails because it is treasonous. They forbid the dissemination of pornographic literature because it corrupts our youth and incites them to criminal acts. What can be more treasonous or criminal than this hate material which is equally destructive of everything that America stands for? Pitting race against race, inciting one segment of our people against another, is no less seditious because it serves only the interests of America's enemies .

Mr. Speaker, it is high time to put a stop to the deliberate use of the U.S. mails for spreading race hatred and to use it as a medium for hate propaganda. This is not what the mails are intended for. The demagogs and hatemongers are exploiting a major medium of communication to serve their own sinister purposes. Postal authorities report that in recent years the volume of hate material going through the mails has increased substantially, but under existing laws they are powerless to prevent the distribution of this material through the mails.

It is for this reason that I am introducing my bills. I believe that this problem can and should be dealt with through legislation. I urge the Congress to give these measures early consideration.

A Bill Relating to Withholding, for Purposes of the Income Tax Imposed by Certain Cities on the Compensation of Federal Employees

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill to permit withholding on the compensation of Federal employees for purposes of income taxes imposed by certain cities. I have been in favor of this legislation for some time for several reasons. It provides for good reciprocal relations between the Federal Government and our city governments which already withhold Federal taxes from the wages of their employees. It is economical in that it provides a less costly way of collecting legal taxes, overall. It is a real convenience to the Federal employees.

I want to dwell on this last point a little bit because at one time many Federal employees thought that this legislation was unfriendly to them. Some, but fortunately a very small minority, through misunderstanding still think so.

The reason certain Federal employees thought the legislation was unfriendly stemmed from the fact that the city earnings tax was unpopular, as most taxes are, to many, particularly to nonresidents of the city who worked in the city. As a matter of fact this form of taxation was considered by some to be unconstitutional, as taxation without representation. However, regardless of the unpopularity of this kind of tax, or its merits, the courts throughout the United States have upheld its legality. This is no longer a question. This form of tax has become an important source of revenue for many of our cities and is rather obviously here to stay.

Federal employees are liable for the tax just as any other person living in or working in a city which imposes such a tax. The present bill has nothing to do with whether a Federal employee is liable for the tax or not.

Federal employees soon found out that when they failed to pay the tax the cities allowed the amounts owed to accumulate until they were sizable enough to warrant the expense of collection. Then when the employee was forced to pay, he had a sizable sum to pay, instead of a modest amount. It included not only the accumulated amount but interest and collection costs.

As a result the Federal employees found, as do all taxpayers find, that it is really a favor to them to have the amounts owed withheld in weekly or monthly amounts where they have none of the nuisance of making returns or the embarrassment of having to budget a sizable accumulated amount.

Most Federal employee unions are on record as favoring this legislation. The officials of the city of St. Louis, part of which I represent, have long requested this legislation. Other cities through their officials and representatives in Congress have urged this legislation. I am hopeful that the Congress will act on this this year.

The bill referred to follows:

A bill relating to withholding, for purposes of the income tax imposed by certain cities, on the compensation of Federal employees

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first section of the Act entitled "An act relating to withholding, for State income tax purposes, on the compensation of Federal employees", approved July 17, 1952 (Public Law 587, 82d Congress; 5 U.S.C., sec. 84b), is hereby amended—

(1) by striking out "State or Territory" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "State, Territory, or city"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For the purposes of this section, the term 'city' means only a city which is incorporated under the law of a State or Territory and which had a population (according to the last decennial census) of seventy-five thousand or more individuals."

Rumanian Freedom

OF
HON. THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 100th anniversary of the reestablishment of Rumanian freedom and independence under the protection of the Western Powers. On this anniversary I wish to express my warm sympathy for the aspirations of the Rumanian nation and for their present struggle against Soviet-Communist domination.

This commemoration is a reminder of the political importance and historical reality of Eastern Europe, where old and fiercely independent peoples have developed their own cultures and national entities. These peoples, with their cultures, are a vital part of Europe, which, without their free contribution and participation within its boundaries, is reduced to a strangled existence, as is the case today. The problem today is not to accept the limited area of discussion imposed on us by the Soviet maneuvering, but to raise the whole question of that part of Europe on which the peace and security for the future so largely depend.

It is obvious to me that the main source of tension and insecurity for the Atlantic Community stems from the inability of the West to exploit this whole unpleasant situation in Soviet-dominated Europe. This situation, as long as we condone it, constitutes an immense benefit to the Soviets, whereas, instead, if we would turn the tables and exploit this situation ourselves against them it would be a terrible thorn in the Soviet flesh.

The inevitable objection that this would increase the cold war is totally untrue. The free hand enjoyed by the Soviets in their controlled part of Europe has in no way lessened the tensions between the Soviets and the United States; on the contrary, it has actually increased them. When we do not use a weapon at our hand, such as the subjugation of a good part of Europe by the Soviets, we are actually encouraging them to continue and even increase their pressure for the advancement of their global Communist aims of world infiltration, subversion, and eventual domination.

This is what is happening right now, when Mikoyan, unlike us, is using every means at his disposal, even kissing American babies, to push us out of Europe.

It is my conviction that the American people will not be taken in by this latest Soviet, Mikoyan propaganda stunt. I believe that, together with the highly deterring defense advocated by Congress, we are going to adopt the policy which would put us on the ground of reality concerning Soviet tactics.

Ormonde A. Kieb

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to pay tribute to the devoted and unselfish service rendered to our Government by Ormonde A. Kieb, who has just resigned as Assistant Postmaster General. Mr. Kieb, a resident of New Jersey, is a personal friend of mine whom I have known for some years, and at considerable sacrifice to himself he accepted his appointment to the Post Office Department, thereby meeting the challenge to reorganize and revitalize the service.

In the 5 years of his administration which will come to a close on January 31, 1959, Mr. Kieb reorganized the operations of the Bureau of Facilities of the Post Office Department by reducing it from nine divisions to three functional line divisions known as Real Estate, Supplies, and Motor Vehicles. In addition a great part of the operations of these divisions was decentralized by being assigned to field offices. In the acquisition of post office space he introduced sound business practices in the commercial leasing technique and this was made possible by his long training in the real estate business in Newark, N.J. He brought about reduced costs in the supply system of the postal service together with reduced delivery schedule time and streamlined various operational procedures. These are only a few of the constructive features that "Toni" Kieb installed for the benefit of the postal service.

Mr. Kieb deserves the heartfelt thanks of all American citizens for his devotion to duty and he leaves his office operating with far greater efficiency and effectiveness than when he first entered into it. He received from the Postmaster General in 1956 the Distinguished Service Award of the Post Office Department in recognition of his untiring zeal and constructive achievements.

I am glad to append herewith Mr. Kieb's letter of resignation to the President dated December 31, 1958, and the President's reply thereto of January 7, 1959. I include also an editorial dated January 10, 1959, from the Newark Evening News entitled "Public Service":

DECEMBER 31, 1958.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is with deep regret that I tender to you my resignation as Assistant Postmaster General to be effective January 31, 1959. It has been a rewarding experience to have completed almost 6-year tour of duty in Government service during your administration as President and under the direction of Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield. I now find the time has come when I must return to private business.

It is a comfort and satisfaction that the responsibilities assigned to me have been completely reorganized.

The Real Estate Division through a competent and able staff, using modern real estate techniques, has obtained modern space for the Department at lower average rentals. Over 2,600 new modern buildings have been erected through public bidding by private investors for lease to the Department. Even though paying local real estate taxes to the communities out of the rent, they reflect lower annual costs to the taxpayers than the occupancy costs of postal space in traditional monumental Government-owned buildings. This modernization program is well under way and ready for rapid acceleration when the Congress provides the funds for your program.

The Department's supply system has been completely revamped. It is operating with much improved efficiency and better administrative control.

The Government-owned motor vehicle fleet has been almost completely changed over to standard production-line trucks in the new red, white, and blue color scheme. This, combined with modern fleet operating standards, shows lower initial costs and lower operating costs per mile. The motor vehicle service facilities are adequately equipped and have been fully redesigned with but a few exceptions in Government-owned garage buildings.

Please understand my appreciation for the opportunity to have contributed a small part to the many accomplishments of these years. It is with keen regret that I now write you to terminate my official assignment.

Mrs. Kieb and I shall always be devoted to Mrs. Eisenhower and yourself, as well as to the kind of Government service your able and dedicated leadership have provided for the Nation.

Sincerely yours,

ORMONDE A. KIEB.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 7, 1959.

The Honorable ORMONDE A. KIEB,
Assistant Postmaster General,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KIEB: I have your letter of December 31, 1958, and regretfully accede to your wishes by accepting your resignation to be effective January 31, 1959. I am aware of the splendid service you have rendered to the Post Office Department since you first assumed your duties in 1953. You have certainly earned the appreciation of your coworkers in Government and the people of the United States for your contribution to the work of the administration.

As you leave Government service to return to private life, you take with you my best wishes for your future health and happiness.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

[From the Newark Evening News, Jan. 10, 1959]

PUBLIC SERVICE

Career men in Government are inclined to be disdainful of the businessman who enters public service. The practice of bureaucracy is supposed to be full of things he just doesn't understand.

The businessman in Government does have his limitations, but on the whole he has been more effective than the professionals will admit and has been able to show them that Government has something to learn from business.

The Eisenhower administration has drawn heavily on business in filling key posts requiring a knowledge of accounting and finance, personnel policies, purchasing and managerial techniques. Most conspicuous among them are Secretary of Labor Mitchell of Elizabeth and C. Douglas Dillon of Far Hills, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs.

Ormonde A. Kieb, Newark realtor, has just resigned after serving 5 years as Assistant Postmaster General. As chief of his Department's Bureau of Facilities, Mr. Kieb's long experience in real estate was of much use to the Government. Among other achievements, his leasing policies produced a substantial reduction in the average rent the Government is paying for post offices.

He returns to private life with the President's thanks for splendid service, a commendation which has been well earned.

A Ukrainian Anniversary

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1959, marks the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian independence.

There is an irony of history here. The Ukrainian people have not known liberty since they were mercilessly incorporated into the Russian Empire in 1920. Their long-sought freedom from the yoke of Russian domination lasted but 2 years, from 1918 to 1920.

Today it is only fitting that we salute this brave and valiant nation that ceaselessly retains the desire to be free. The Ukrainian people are proud, individualistic, and have a tremendous amount of resilience to the present fates of history. Even though they are once again under the hated heel of historic domination, and have been under Soviet domination longer than any other nation now under Kremlin control, there is no shadow of doubt but that the interlude of a 2-year span of freedom immediately after World War I was enough to make the reality of freedom the ultimate national goal.

Since 1920 the Ukraine has been one of the bloodiest battlefields of modern history. The people of this rich agricultural land have died by the hundreds of thousands. Neither the dead nor the living can celebrate the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian independence. The Iron Curtain, so obvious to the rest of the world, is also within the segments of the Russian Empire.

Thus it is up to us who live in freedom not to let this day pass without recognizing its significance to those brave men and women who make such an event meaningful. I, for one, am happy to be able to give this recognition. To the peoples of the Ukraine and those of Ukrainian descent in this country, I give my respect and my admiration.

The Bipartisan Seminar

OF
HON. LEONARD G. WOLF
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, a new institution began this year on Capitol Hill and I, for one, hope that it will grow and become a part of the permanent orientation process for new Congressmen. The purpose of this institution, which is called the Bipartisan Seminar, is to encourage the confidence of new Members by broadening their understanding of the legislative process. The meetings, held at the Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress, were exciting and informative. Answers were given to perplexing problems which many times vex, annoy, and frustrate the freshman Congressman. Insight was given to us from our senior colleagues on the workings and the meanings of the rules by our beloved Parliamentarian, Lewis Deschler; the problems of committee work for junior Congressmen by worthy and distinguished alumni of this body, Senator Engle, of California, and Senator Keating, of New York; the House as a changing institution was brilliantly analyzed and discussed by Senator McCarthy, of Minnesota, Senator Scott, of Pennsylvania, and George Galloway, of the Library of Congress. Particularly informative was the discussion by Congressman Baldwin, of California, Congressman Coffin, of Maine, Congressman Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, and Congressman Udall, of Arizona. Participating in the opening session was the chief of the Washington bureau of the New York Times, James Reston.

From this list of impressive and brilliant people one is quickly able to ascertain the importance of these meetings. I commend these gentlemen and I thank the bipartisan sponsoring committee: JOHN F. BALDWIN, Republican, of California; FRANK M. COFFIN, Democrat, of Maine; CARL ELLIOTT, Democrat, of Alabama; GERALD R. FORD, JR., Republican, of Michigan; PETER FRELINGHUYSEN, JR., Republican, of New Jersey; JAMES G. FULTON, Republican, of Pennsylvania; MELVIN PRICE, Democrat, of Illinois; and STEWART L. UDALL, Democrat, of Arizona.

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, January 29 of each year marks the anniversary of the birth of Albert Gallatin, brilliant U.S. Secretary of the Treasury under Thomas Jefferson. Gallatin was born on January 29, 1761, in Geneva, Switzerland, the descendant of a family of watchmakers. Already then, as today, Switzerland was the center of a great watch industry which in our own day plays such an important part in United States-Swiss trade relations.

Gallatin came to America in 1780 and threw in his lot with the American patriots. After the establishment of the new U.S. Republic he embarked on a political career in which he served successively as a member of the Pennsylvania State Legislature, Member of the U.S. House of Representatives, U.S. Senator, Secretary of the Treasury, and finally as U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain and later to France.

He devoted his life and work to many worthwhile enterprises, the most important of which were his advocacy of a system of free universal education, reform of Federal tax and budgetary policies, and the promotion of sound trade relations with other nations. He also advocated liberalization of the immigration and naturalization laws.

As we offer our tribute today to Albert Gallatin, we pay our respects to the memory of a great American who laid the basic framework for policies which have helped to bring the United States to a position of preeminence in the marketplaces of the world. The ruling principle of his life was friendly commerce with other nations as an enduring promise of America's peaceful growth, and that principle is still a powerful factor in our continued growth and our leadership of the free world. The expansion of trade and commerce among the free nations is as vital today as it was in Gallatin's day.

Unfortunately, the present administration has shown a strong tendency to yield to the protectionists and those who seek to erect new barriers in our trade relations with the world. Such policy is against the liberal trade traditions of Gallatin. I trust that we shall return to the sound policies advocated by Albert Gallatin.

A Bill To Protect Farmers and Other Persons Who Are Required To Treat Patronage Dividends as Income for Federal Income Tax Purposes by Providing for the Collection of Income Tax at Source on Such Dividends and To Provide Tax Equity

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 22, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced today a bill designed to protect farmers and other persons who are required to treat patronage dividends as income for Federal income tax purposes by providing for the collection of income tax at source on such dividends and to provide tax equity.

My bill provides a method of collecting some tax from cooperatives that I have advocated for several years. I have been particularly interested in it from the standpoint of the cooperative member, particularly the farmer who does not have a great deal of cash at his disposal. It is only through a withholding device like this that he will not have his personal cash position burdened with a taxpayment as the result of a noncash patronage dividend. This bill will, of course, produce revenue for the Treasury Department and will bring about a highly desirable equality of taxation among various types of business, some of which are now suffering quite unduly from the competition of the untaxed cooperatives.

A bill to protect farmers and other persons who are required to treat patronage dividends as income for Federal income tax purposes by providing for the collection of income tax at source on such dividends and to provide tax equity

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 39. Credit for income tax collected at source on certain patronage dividends.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The amount withheld under section 7901 as tax on patronage dividends shall be allowed to the recipient of the income as a credit against the tax imposed by this subtitle.

"(b) YEAR OF CREDIT.—The amount so withheld during any calendar year shall be allowed as a credit for the taxable year beginning in such calendar year. If more than one taxable year begins in a calendar year, such amount shall be allowed as a credit for the last taxable year so beginning."

(b) The table of sections for such part IV is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Sec. 39. Credit for income tax collected at source on certain patronage dividends."

SEC. 2. (a) Subtitle F of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 81—COLLECTION OF INCOME TAX AT SOURCE ON CERTAIN PATRONAGE DIVIDENDS

"Sec. 7901. Income tax collected at source.

"Sec. 7902. Patronage dividend defined.

"SEC. 7901. Income tax collected at source.

"The Secretary or his delegate shall by regulations provide for the deduction and withholding on patronage dividends of a tax equal to 20 percent of the amount of each patronage dividend (as defined in section 274 and subject to the limitation in amount contained therein) paid in a form other than coin, currency or check dated and payable no later than the date of delivery thereof, and paid after September 30, 1956."

(b) The table of chapters for subtitle F is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Chapter 81. Collection of income tax at source of certain patronage dividends"

Deductibility of patronage dividends

SEC. 3. There shall be added to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 following section 273 a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 274. Patronage dividends paid by cooperative corporations.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—No deduction or other reduction of taxable income shall be allowed to cooperative corporations for amounts paid as 'patronage dividends' by such corporations except to the extent such dividends increase the taxable income of the recipient for the taxable year of receipt.

For the purposes of this subsection.

"(1) Such dividends shall be deemed to have been received in the ordinary course of a trade or business carried on by the recipient, and

"(2) No exemption, exclusion, credit or deduction available to the recipient shall be taken into account.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—

"(1) COOPERATIVE CORPORATION.—For the purposes of this section the term 'cooperative corporation' means a corporation (A) that calls itself a 'cooperative' or 'co-op', or (B) that represents to any persons or classes of persons which deal with it that their patronage will or may entitle them (i) to the payment, either actually or constructively, of patronage dividends, or (ii) to an equity interest in any of the corporations' assets, or (C) that is otherwise operated for the mutual benefit of persons or classes of persons that deal with it; but such term does not include a mutual insurance company or any corporation otherwise exempt under this chapter.

"(2) PATRONAGE DIVIDEND.—For the purposes of this section the term 'patronage dividend' means an allocation or a distribution paid or payable (whether or not in money and whether described as a refund, rebate, price adjustment, or payment of a balance due under a marketing agreement) to member patrons or to member and nonmember patrons on some basis related to their sales to, purchases from, deposits with, investments in, loans from, or other transactions with the corporation during the taxable year, if (A) the allocation or distribution is conditional (i) upon profits or margins being earned by the corporation from all its operations or a class of its operations during its fiscal year, or (ii) upon income attributable to the resale of the producer's product along with products or a class or classes of products of some other producers less any deductions, determination of which is within the discretion of the corporation, or (B) the amount of the allocation or distribution can be determined only with reference to the amount of the profits, margins, or income earned, or (C) the amount of the allocation or distribution can be determined only after declaration or payment of dividends on any class of stock of the corporation or only after the fixing of sums to be transferred to capital, reserves, or surplus."

Taxation of farmers' cooperatives

SEC. 4. Section 522 (b)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be amended to read as follows:

"(b) COMPUTATION OF TAXABLE INCOME.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—In computing the taxable income of such an organization there shall be allowed, subject to the limitations provided in section 274, as deductions from gross income (in addition to other deductions allowable under this chapter)—

"(A) amounts paid as dividends during the taxable year on its capital stock, and

"(B) amounts allocated during the taxable year to patrons with respect to its income not derived from patronage (whether or not such income was derived during such taxable year) whether paid in cash, merchandise, capital stock, revolving fund certificates, retain certificates, certificates of indebtedness, letters of advice, or in some other manner that discloses to each patron the dollar amount allocated to him. Allocations made after the close of the taxable year and on or before the 15th day of the 9th month following the close of such year shall be considered as made on the last day of such taxable year to the extent the allocations are attributable to income derived before the close of such year."

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 1959

Msgr. Nicholas Babak, vice president of St. Basil's College, Stamford, Conn., offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Heavenly Father, we humbly thank Thee for the many blessings which Thou hast lavished upon our land and its people. Guide us in Thy mercy, and extend Thy blessings and grace to all. Protect us from war; strengthen the peace; and enlighten our minds.

May the men who guide us remain fearless in the eyes of those who seek to confound us. Grant that they may never be swayed by those who seek to betray us. Give them the strength for leadership in Thy name, to renew hope for a world of justice, for a world of lasting peace for all.

May the Ukrainian people, the first victims of atheistic and communistic imperialism which seeks to engulf the entire world, know that we at last have heard their cry for freedom. Grant, O Lord, that they may soon regain their independence, so hard won—and lost—41 years ago.

Preserve us, O Lord, in our devotion to Thee. Bless and keep, in health and strength, the President and all the other members of our Government. Through Thy divine guidance make them the instruments in securing justice and freedom as Thou didst will it for all Thy children. Amen.

RESOLUTIONS OF WYOMING STATE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ASSOCIATION

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD six resolutions unanimously adopted by the Wyoming State Rural Electric Association and ask that they be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS, WYOMING STATE RURAL ELECTRIC ASSOCIATION

RESOLUTION 1

Whereas the present accounting and budet system is very unfair in respect to multipurpose hydroelectric projects inasmuch as the cost is set up as an expenditure and it so appears in the annual budget: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wyoming State REA Association favor passage in the 86th Congress of a bill that would distinguish between expenditures and investments, so that the American people may be presented with the facts concerning Federal investment in the Federal power program.

RESOLUTION 2

Whereas the cost allocation on several hydroelectric projects has been changed several times during the period of construction, always adjusting the percentage of cost allocated to power upward: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wyoming State REA Association urge the early passage in the 86th Congress a bill identical to, or very similar to the Trimble bill.

RESOLUTION 3

Whereas in June 1957, the Secretary of Agriculture did reorganize REA by requiring that all loans of $500,000 or more, and all loans of whatever amount, to new borrowers be reviewed by the office of the Secretary of Agriculture; and

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture supported a bill in Congress to increase interest rates: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That as soon as the 86th Congress convenes, that a bill identical to the Humphrey-Price bill, as amended by the House subcommittee, which would restore to the REA Administrator all of the functions and authority vested in him by the original REA Act of 1936, be introduced and passed.

RESOLUTION 4

Whereas the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation has begun construction of units of the upper Colorado storage project; and

Whereas the Authorization Act for such storage project includes high-voltage electric transmission lines from storage unit switchyards to substations at major load centers and a backbone transmission grid to interconnect the powerplants of the project and other Federal powerplants and utility systems of the area; and

Whereas preference users of power in the State of Wyoming, which is one of the States in the upper basin will be entitled to be able to purchase and use large quantities of firm power and energy from the upper Colorado storage project when it becomes available: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Wyoming State Rural Electric Association, That this association be on record in favor of congressional appropriations for the orderly but rapid construction of such authorized transmission system for the upper Colorado storage project, including a high-voltage line extending from Flaming Gorge dam and powerplant into Wyoming to connect with the existing Federal transmission grid at Sinclair, Wyo.

RESOLUTION 7

Whereas the proposed legislation to increase the interest rates on REA loans is not in the best interest of our rural electric cooperatives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wyoming REA oppose any proposed legislation or action designed to, or likely to increase the cost of loan funds to Rural Electric Cooperatives of Wyoming.

RESOLUTION 8

Whereas the Yellowtail dam and powerplant, authorized by Congress as a unit of the Missouri River Basin project will be of great benefit to the reclamation program; and

Whereas electric power users will need and are willing to purchase the power to be produced at Yellowtail: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Wyoming State Rural Electric Association, That this Association be on record in favor of congressional appropriations for the orderly but rapid construction of the Yellowtail Dam powerplant, and such electric transmission system as may be required.

RESOLUTIONS OF ORGANIZATIONS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, three resolutions adopted by organizations of the State of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolutions were received and referred as indicated:

To the Committee on Armed Services:

"Whereas there is located within the bounds of the county of Suffolk, State of New York, numerous so-called defense plants who are solely or to a great extent, engaged in the manufacture of defense items of one form or another; and

"Whereas by virtue of their location, thousands of families have located in our county, depending upon the aforesaid defense plants for their livelihood; and

"Whereas the economy of our county in general and particularly the five western towns of the county, namely, Babylon, Huntington, Smithtown, Islip, and Brookhaven, is to a great extent, dependent upon the steady and continued employment of all employees of all of the plants located in our county; and

"Whereas from time to time and far too frequently, serious layoffs of employees occur at one or more of said defense plants through the cancellation of existing defense contracts, completion of contracts or diversion of contracts to other areas of the United States; and

"Whereas the town board of the town of Brookhaven recognizes the importance of continued full operation of all defense plants within Suffolk County, because of the impact upon an orderly economy, when contracts run out or are canceled, resulting in spontaneous layoffs of large numbers of employees without too much advance notice: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the town board of the town of Brookhaven by the adoption of this resolution, requests that the Defense Department of the U.S. Government or other appropriate agency of the Government, take immediate steps to award sufficient contracts to guarantee full employment to all defense plants in Suffolk County; and be it further

"Resolved, that the clerk of this board forthwith forward certified copy of this resolution to the following: U.S. Department of Defense, U.S. Senators Jacob K. Javits and Kenneth B. Keating, Congressman Stuyvesant Wainwright, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

"PERCY B. RAYNOR,
"Supervisor.

"PATCHOGUE, N. Y., January 13, 1959."

To the Committee on Finance:

"RESOLUTION OF BLAUVELT REPUBLICAN CLUB, BLAUVELT, N.Y.

"Resolved, That because of the inequities in the present tax structure, the Blauvelt Republican Club petition its representatives in the Federal and State Governments to aid and abet legislation to afford relief to the wage earner, to wit:

"Permit the deduction of transportation costs, including commutation, in computing adjusted gross income for tax purposes.

"In adopting this resolution, consideration has been given to the fact that the crowded living conditions of many of our industrial centers have forced workers to seek living quarters in residential areas, remote from their place of business; where transportation expenses must be incurred as a necessary part of earning a living. Precedents have been set by the allowance of union dues, work clothes, and tools as good deductions, ergo it is held that transportation expense necessary for the wage earner to go to and from his place of employment, is of equal importance."

To the Committee on Public Works:

"RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY GRAND COUNCIL OF NEW YORK, INC., ORDER OF UNITED COMMERCIAL TRAVELERS OF AMERICA, ELMIRA, N.Y., JUNE 6, 1958

"FEDERAL-STATE HIGHWAY PROGRAM

"Whereas completion of the Interstate System will bring about a new era in the field of highway transportation, and also create great advantages for all traveling Americans, and especially those who use the highways in earning their living, and as the highway program is in need of additional funds, and is also threatened by raids from governmental and other agencies which if successful could extend the completion date of the highway program and lead to increased taxes being placed on the highway user: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the the Grand Council of New York, Order of United Commercial Travelers of America, That Congress hold highway user taxes, now consigned to the Highway Trust Fund, at their present levels.

"Congress reject any attempts to increase the mileage of the Interstate System beyond the 41,000 miles provided for in the 1956 Highway Act.

"Congress obtain the additional moneys needed for the Highway Trust Fund from general funds, since the Interstate System is a vital part of national defense, and helps many others as well, and therefore the highway user should not have to pay for 100 percent of its cost.

"Congress pass the Jones bill, or similar legislation, which deny the use of Federal funds to the States for reimbursement to utility companies for costs of relocating their facilities along public road rights-of-way.

"Congress refuse any agency other than the Bureau of Public Roads the right to obtain moneys from the Federal Highway Trust Fund; be it further "Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent all Members of the State's congressional delegation, and to the press.

EDWIN K. KOHL,
WM. B. WHITE,
"Resolution Committee.

"Yours truly,

"HAROLD C. RASMUS,
"Grand Secretary, United Commercial Travelers of America."
